STURIES TO SUIT EVERY TASTE

OUR MOTTO IS: "PLAY THE GAME!"

No. 837, Vol. XVI. New Series.]

ONE PENNY.

[Week Ending June 23: d, 1917.

THE CLASSICALS' CAPTURE! See Our : Tale!

HE GILLAND ASIT

A Magnificent New Long Complete Story, dealing with the Adventures of Jimmy Silver & Co. at Rookwood School.

OWEN CONQUEST.

The 1st Chapter.

Morny's New Pal, Look at them!" yril Peele, of the Fourth Form. attractive. aced out of the window of Study |

Cownsend, Topham, and Gower re seated round the study-table. re was a haze of cigarette-smoke he room.

he nuts of the Fourth were enjoythemselves in their own peculiar | that sunny afternoon.

hrough the open window, shouts ld be heard from the cricket-field, ere Jimmy Silver's eleven were ying a Modern team. But the I savagely.

sunshine and the breeze, and the | The juniors joined him at the | napped," remarked Topham. "Acgreen cricket-field, did not call the window. nuts of Rookwood out of doors. They found banker in the study more tracted his brows savagely as he | Peele was staring from the window, but it was not towards the cricketground that his glance was turned.

It rested on two juniors in the quadrangle below. One was in flannels, and had evidently come off the field after his innings. The other was an elegant youth in Etons.

Townsend, who was shuffling the cards, looked round lazily towards Peele.

"What's goin' on?" he asked.

downward.

"And Morny!" said Gower. The two juniors below were The nuts stared down from the chatting cheerily, heedless and un- window. From below, the voices of study window. "Thick as thieves!" said Peele bitterly. "Accordin' to what Morny used to say, Erroll is a thief, as a matter of fact. An' now they're said Erroll.

chummy." Morningto

"Jolly queer!" said Townsend. shrugging his shoulders. "What can I Morny see in the chap. And they "Look at them!" repeated Peele | used to be at daggers drawn, too!" | "On an afternoon like this?" said | "That was before Morny was kid- Erroll, "It's not good enough, window. cordin' to his yarn, Erroll got him "Erroll!" said Townsend, glancing out of that."

"That don't make any difference." "It seems to to Morny."

conscious of the dark glances from the | Erroll and Mornington floated up to them.

"You'll be wanted for fieldin' soon, Erroll," Mornington was saying. "Come down and see the match," Mornington laughed.

"There's a little party in my study," he said. "I was thinkin' of joinin' it!"

Mornington and Erroll walked away towards the cricket-ground while the latter was speaking. The dandy of Rookwood had evidently given up the idea of joining the sportive circle in his study, for Morny. Come along to the cricket.

I wish you could hit it off better with Jimmy Silver. You ought to have a place in the team on your form!"

the sake of his new chum. Peele and his companions exchanged dark glances. "There they go!" said Peele. "Morny's about done with us! You can see that rotter's game. He wants to make a break between Morny and us. I've seen his idea some time ago!"

"Lookin' after Morny's morals!" grinned Townsend. "I like that! Why, Morny's the blackest sheep of the whole flock, and chance it!"

"He's not comin' here," said Topham. "He's regularly given us the go-by since he chummed with Erroll. I'd like to put a spoke in that interferin' cad's wheel. But-but a fellow can't lick him."

"That's so," said Gower. "I've tried, an' I know."

"Come an' get on with the game. We can do without Morny!" Peele wrinkled his brows.

"That's all very well," he said. "We don't want to do without Morny. He's been our pal, an' we made him our leader, an' now he's thrown as ever for that fellow Erroll. I don't feel inclined to stand it, for "What can we do?" growled Townsend. "Morny always has his own way! Look at the way he picked up that little ragamuffin, 'Erbert, an' brought him to Rookwood, an' got the Head to let him enter the school as a new kid. We were down on that; but did it make any difference to Morny? Not a

"He's an obstinate cad! But we don't want to lose Morny. We can't keep our end up against Jimmy Silver without Morny," remarked Gower.

"He'll be chummin' with Jimmy Silver next, if Erroll can work it." sneered Peele. "That's the cad's game!"

"Blessed are the peacemakers!" grinned Townsend.

"It's jolly queer, too," said Peele, frowning. "When Erroll came here, that kid from the slums, 'Erbert, swore that the man who brought him wasn't really Captain Erroll at all, but a rotter he called Gentleman Jim, a cracksman. Mornington believed the yarn, an' accused Erroll. I must say I never swallowed be somethin' in it?" Peele paused and looked at his nutty companions.

it. But-but suppose there should

It was evident that, with Cyril Peele, the wish was father to the thought.

Morny's desertion of his old cronies had exasperated and alarmed the nuts, and there was little that Peele, at least, would not have stopped at to make a break between the new friends.

Nobody but Morny and little 'Erbert of the Second Form had believed that strange accusation against Kit Erroll.

But any weapon was good enough to use against an enemy, in Peele's opinion. The wealthy and reckless Mornington was too valuable a pal to be lost if it could be helped. "There's nothin' in it," Topham.

"Morny believes there was." "Morny was an ass! An' he's chucked it now, too."

"That's because Erroll got him away from the kidnappers, and he feels called upon to be grateful," sneered Peele.

"But Erroll knocked the yarn on the head," said Townsend

(Continued on the next page.)

the trouble of gettin' a photograph of Captain Erroll, and didn't it turn out has never been near Rookwood

since," said Peele. "There's a chance, at least, that there was somethin' in the yarn. Look here, let's have that kid 'Erbert up here, and question

"Tell him Morny wants him. You

"I tell you there may be somethin' in it. If we could fix it on Erroll an'

give him the kybosh, Morny comes

"Oh, I'll fetch the kid, if you like," said Topham, yawning. "But you're barkin' up the wrong tree, Peele.

The "Giddy Goats" of Rookwood

resumed their game while they waited for Topham to return with the waif of Rookwood. In about ten minutes

there was a tap at the door, and little

fag. He had gone to join Morning-

Topham had not returned with the 'Erbert of the Second came into the

"Come in, kid," said Peele.

study, and Peele closed the door.

The 2nd Chapter.

ington wanted me 'ere," he said.

"Yes, sir," said 'Erbert.

twisted his thumbs uneasily.

ago?" said Peele.

"Ye-e-es."

father."

claimed.

Erroll?"

quick glances.

"Yes, sir."

Silence.

Gentleman Jim?"

not to talk about it."

Mornington Chips In!

'Erbert looked round the study

"Master Topham told me Morn-

"That's all right! We want you,"

He stood shuffling his feet. The little waif had been some time at Rookwood now, since Mornington, following a generous impulse, had rescued him from want. But he had the nuts of Rookwood prided themselves. He shuffled his feet and

"You remember Erroll of the Fourth coming here, a few weeks

Captain

"You told Mornington that the man wasn't Captain Erroll, but a criminal called Gentleman Jim, a cracksman you'd seen and known when you lived in some slum or other

Erbert did not reply, but his gaze wandered uneasily to the door. But yarn." said Peele. "But I've been wonderin' whether there was anythin' in it. Just you go ahead, kid, an' tell us all you know about that man.

Gentleman Jim, and Erroll. Give us

"Eh? Why can't you?" he ex-

Master Mornington ave told me

the whole yarn from start to finish."

"I Lan't!" stammered 'Erbert.

Peele stared at him angrily.

"Now, we didn't swallow that

Cyril Peele had his back to the door.

in London," continued Peele.

The fag shifted uncomfortably.

said Peele. "Don't be alarmed. I only want to ask you some ques-puzzled. He had evidently expected ton on the cricket-ground.

to see Mornington there.

tions.

And Topham left the study.

'Silly waste of time,"

"He wouldn't come-"

go, Toppy!"

back to us:"

There's nothin' in it."

'Erbert looked in.

Topham.

"That's so! But Erroll's father to be as like Erroll as two peas?"

LIGHT AT LAST!

Published

Every Wonday

(Continued from the previous page.)

the man well, according to your account."

The fag did not answer. "Do you hear me?" shouted Peele angrily.

"I 'ear you, Master Peele."

"Well, answer, then!"

"I can't, sir." "You mean you won't, you cheeky cub!" exclaimed Townsend.

"Well, I won't, then!" said 'Erbert sullenly. "Master Mornington 'ave told me not to say nothin' about Erroll, an' I ain't going to."

"You want your arms twisted, you mean?" asked Peele. 'Erbert backed away a little.

"I s'pose you can bully me, if you want, now you've got me 'ere," he said steadily. "But I ain't sayin' nothin', not agin Master Mornington's orders."

Peele strode towards him.

The fag put up his fists at once. But Townsend and Gower joined Peele, and in a moment 'Erbert was wriggling in the grasp of the three. Peele took a savage grip upon his

"Are you going to answer my questions now?" he asked, between his

"No, I ain't!"

"Take that, then!" There was a yell of anguish from Erbert as Peele twisted his arm with cruel force.

He struggled in vain in the grip of the three nuts.

Lemme go!" panted "Ow! "I ain't going to tell you long. Erbert. Let me alone, you coward! nothin'! Yah! Oh!"

The fag's yells rang through the study as Peele twisted his arm again. "Now will you speak up, you scrubby little cad?" hissed Peele.

"No!" yelled 'Erbert. "I won't! 'Elp! 'Elp!

"Hallo! What the merry dickens The door was thrown open, and Mornington strode into the study. He stared at the scene in blank astonishment for a moment.

Then his brow grew thunderous. "Bullyin' 'Erbert-what? Let him go at once, you cads!"

He strode at the nuts with his fists clenched, and a blaze in his eyes.

Peele & Co. released the fag, who scuttled behind Mornington at once. The nuts of the Fourth looked angry and irresolute. not yet learned the repose upon which "Have they hurt you, kid?" asked Mornington.

"N-not much, sir," faltered 'Erbert. "It-it's all right."

"What were the cads bullyin' you

"They wanted to know about Erroll and Gentleman Jim, sir!" muttered "The man who brought him here 'Erbert. "I wasn't sayin' nothin', as Erroll-his you told me, sir."

Mornington made a gesture to the | betrayed the fact without the slightest

"Cut off, 'Erbert!"

Peele made a movement forward. He backed away again as Mornington faced him, with a glitter in his eyes.

'Erbert scudded out of the study. "So you were bullyin' that kid to make him talk about Erroll?" said Mornington. "You won't do that again. Peele!" "Who's goin' to stop me?" sneered Peele.

"I am! I'll lick you till you can't stand if you put a finger on that kid exclaimed Mornington savagely. "Understand that! And if I have two words from you, I'll lick you now. You're goin' to leave 'Erbert alone, and you're goin' to leave Erroll alone!"

"You've chummed up with the son of a cracksman, as you always called him," sneered Townsend.

The nuts of the Fourth exchanged "Never mind what I called him. Oh! said Peele, with a deep That's done with now." breath. "Morny's told you to keep it "Is it?" said Peele. "Well, it's not done with! I believe it was true all dark since he's made friends with the time, an' I believe you know it now, Morny, an' you want to keep it "Well, never mind, Morny. We dark because you've palled on with him. As for lettin' him alone, I'll want to know the facts. Do you still tell you what I'm goin' to do. I'm believe that Erroll is the son of this goin' to show him up, an' get him kicked out of Rookwood! So you can put that in your pipe an' smoke it! Your burglar pal- Oh!"

Peele broke off, with a yell of rage,

The next instant he rushed at Smack!

"Have you any idea where Gentleman Jim can be found by the police?" Still silence.

Peele's eyes glittered dangerously. "Another thing. You've seen the as Mornington struck him across the photograph of Captain Erroll. It's mouth. like Erroll of the Fourth-we've all noticed that. But is it like the man | Mornington. you called Gentleman Jim—the man who brought him here? You know I ing on, with sullen faces. Their feel- I wounded. He was a planter there! Somme offensive, and on leaving hosnot interfere.

The dandy of the Fourth met his with grim vigour.

rapid succession, and Peele reeled back, and went with a crash to the Mornington looked down on him grimly.

"Want any more?" he asked. Peele groaned.

"You fellows feelin' inclined for a little trouble this merry afternoon?" asked Mornington, with a mocking look at Townsend and Gower.

"Go an' eat coke!" growled Townsend. Mornington laughed, and quitted the study. Townsend helped Peele to his feet. The cad of the Fourth was pale with rage, and his eyes glittered like a serpent's. "I'll make Morny smart for that!" | captain of the Fourth came up. he muttered. "And I can do it!

believe he knows, now, that Erroll is what he accused him of bein'! I believe he knows it, by gad, an' that's why he's warned the kid not to talk! And I'm goin' to have the truth out before all Rookwood!"

"You can't do it!" said Gower. Peele gritted his teeth.

"I know the way!" he said. "I've got it cut and dried! I'd rather have made sure first; but now I'm goin' to chance it! I've got a surprise up my sleeve for Morny an' his precious chum!"

And Peele went savagely out of the

"What the merry dickens was he drivin' at?" said Gower, in wonder.

"Only gas!" said Townsend, shrugging his shoulders. "Let's get on with the game!"

But there was more than "gas" in Peele's words, as Mornington-and Kit Erroll-were to discover before

The 3rd Chapter. Gentle Persuasion.

Jimmy Silver paused. The captain of the Fourth was sauntering through the archway into Little Quad; towards the library, when he came on the scene. On the old oaken bench near the clear."

stone arch four numbers were seated Peele held an open newspaper in his hands, and Townsend, Topham, and Gower were gathering close to read it with him. There was evidently something in the newspaper that intensely interested Peele & Co. It was the day following the scene in Mornington's study. Since that scene Mornington had been on icy terms with his former chums—a fact that did not seem to worry the lordly Morny in the least.

A more tactful fellow than Mornington might have made the break with his old friends a little more gradual and delicate. But since he had chummed with Erroll, Morny had changed somewhat, and for the present, at least, he seemed "fed-up' with the nuts and their ways, and he compunction. Whether he was lost for good to that select circle, or whether it was merely temporary, could not be saidprobably the latter.

But, in any case, the dandy of the Fourth did that which was right in his own eyes, with complete disregard for the feeling of others.

Undoubtedly, under Erroll's influence, Mornington was a good deal less of a blackguard than he had formerly been. But his cool indifference to his own friends and their opinion had a naturally exasperating effect upon them.

When Morny was tired of his new role, he would doubtless expect them to come round again at the beckoning of his finger. That was Morny's way. But, little as he cared what they thought, he did not dream of the real extent to which his change of line had exasperated them. To be taken up, or thrown over, at Morny's lordly will was not flattering. And Peele, who had been knocked down in his own study, was bitterest of all.

The four juniors were so deeply engrossed in the newspaper that they did not observe Jimmy Silver. Jimmy would have passed on his way but for the fact that they were speaking of Erroll in a way that struck his attention at once.

"There it is, in print!" said Peele, through his compressed lips. "If Captain Erroll is Erroll's father, he can say so. He's still in England."

"So it seems," said Townsend. "I understood that he had gone back to Townsend and Gower stood look- British Honduras after he was

ing was all with Peele, but they did | when he joined up. I know that.

Erroll thinks he's gone back." "I know he does-I've heard him erstwhile chum's attack coolly and say so," grinned Peele. "Now, if he's Captain Erroll's son, as he says, His left and right came out in how can he think his father's gone back to America when the newspaper says he's in England?"

> "By gad!" said Topham; "it looks | Raby. as if you're right, Peele."

"I was sure of it," said Peele. "I found this in the paper yesterday. That's what started me on it; and I from his pater he'll be glad to haven't any doubt at all that Morny | that he's safe." knows the truth about Erroll and is keepin' it dark. It's odd the fellow | school-house with the newspapa being like Captain Erroll's portrait. | his hand. But a son generally knows where his father is."

"Ha, ha! Yes, rather." Jimmy Silver walked towards the bench. He disdained to listen to the talk of the nuts, though what they had said had made him very curious. "Hush!" muttered Peele, as the

He hastily thrust the newspaper under his jacket.

"Something about Erroll's father in that paper?" asked Jimmy. "Find out!" said Peele, coolly.

"I'm asking you to find out. It would interest Erroll. Lend me the paper to show him," said Jimmy

"That's my paper, an' I'm keepin' it," said Peele.

"You said Captain Erroll was in England," said Jimmy. "It's supposed that he went home to British Honduras after being wounded." Peele yawned.

"Erroll must know," grinned Topham. "Ask Erroll."

'He may have been stopped by the submarines or something, and hasn't written to Erroll yet," said Jimmy. "Erroll has a right to see that paper, Peele. Lend it to me." "I won't!"

"Tell me its name and date then, so that I can tell Erroll."

"Go and eat coke!"

Jimmy Silver's eyes gleamed. The four nuts rose to their feet and stood together. Four to one; they were not afraid of the chief of the Fistical Four. Jimmy smiled, and uttered the signal of the Rook patrol. It echoed through the stone archway. "He's calling those other cads muttered Gowerl "Let's There was a patter of feet from Big Quad, and Lovell, Raby, and Newcome came through the archway at a

'Hullo! What's up?" demanded

Jimmy Silver pointed to Peele. "That worm's got a newspaper with something about Erroll's father in it," he said. "He won't lend it to me. want to borrow it."

"Rotten worm!" said Raby. "Why can't you lend your paper?" "Because I won't!" snarled Peele.

"Hands off, you rotters!" "You can have it back afterwards," said Jimmy.

Peele did not reply, but he moved away. The Fistical Four moved after him fast enough. "Hands off, I tell you!" shouted

But Jimmy Silver did not "hands off": he put his hands on-hard! Cyril Peele struggled with him furiously.

The Co., grinning, charged the other three nuts off the scene. Towny and Toppy and Gower were scattered before their rush.

Peele struggled in vain in Jimmy Silver's sturdy grasp. The crumpled newspaper was jerked out from under Jimmy cheerfully sat his jacket. Peele down on the ground with a

"Thanks for the loan of the paper," he smiled. "I'll leave it in your study when I'm through with it." "Hang you!" said Peele, between

He scrambled up, and looked for a moment as if he would spring at Jimmy Silver. But he knew that it would be futile; and he turned away. scowling blackly. Lovell and Raby and Newcome rejoined their leader. "Why didn't the disobliging rotter want to let you see the paper, Jimmy?" asked Newcome, in wonder. "Blessed if I know-they've got something up against Erroll, I suppose. I'll soon see what there is here about Erroll's pater." Jimmy opened the paper and scanned the columns in search of the item of news that had so interested the nuts. He soon found it-a paragraph marked with pencil. The Fistical Four read it together:

"Among the passengers landed from the S.S. Ceiba, recently sunk by a German submarine, is Captain Erroll. The gallant captain, who was a planter in British Honduras before the war, was severely wounded in the pital intended to return to his col home. Captain Erroll's many fr will not regret that the activity of Hun pirates compels him to ref

somewhat longer in his native la

The Fistical Four looked at or "I suppose Erroll knows!"

"I-I suppose, so," said Ji Silver. "Anyway, I'm going to this paper to him. If he hasn't d

And Jimmy Silver hurried off the

The 4th Chapter. Under the Shadow.

"What's the trouble?"

Mornington asked the question. was lounging in the window-sea Erroll's study. Higgs and minor, Erroll's study-mates, werd of doors.

Mornington had just come in, an had found Erroll with a moody h in deep thought. Erroll su slightly as the dandy of the Fd

"Nothing!" he said.

"Thinkin' about Gentleman J. "Well, yes," said Erroll, colou! "I can't help thinking of

"You've seen the last of the ter," said Mornington. "You've! me you are sure that he is not father—and I feel sure of it too. bother about him?"

"I am sure he is not my fait though he has always called him that," said Erroll quietly. "I am the son of a cracksman. But-by the other fellows knew all you kn Morny, they would believe-"

"They don't know, and they wi

"I'm not so sure," said Erroll. haven't finished with that man Morny. Since I told you my s you've palled with me, and I'm glad of it-but the others woul look at it as you do. If it came that the man who brought me l and called himself Captain Er was in reality Gentleman Jim cracksman--." He pausednot my fault! But-but I'm under a name that does not bell to me---" "But you don't know your. name," said Mornington. "Yo as much entitled to that as

"That's true—I must be ca something," said the junior, with slight smile. "I may as well called Erroll as anything

"Why did Gentleman Jim pick that name for you?" asked Morn ton. "It's not a common name. "I don't know. Unless--" Er paused. "You remember, Mor when you got the real Capy Erroll's photograph it turned out be exactly like me. Gentleman may have known of the resembla and that may be why he chose name for me to come to Rookw under. It's queer. I-I've been thi ing, Morny---." He broke

"There's nothin' to worry yo give it a rest."

"But it does worry me," said Er quietly. "I'm not doing wrong using the name since I must use so name. But I am represented h as the son of Captain Erroll—an am not his son. That does we

"I don't see that it hurts Didn't you tell me that Captain Er went back to British Honduras a. leavin' the army?"

"Yes. Gentleman Jim told me "Well, it won't hurt a man America to be supposed to have a at Rookwood," said Morning laughing. "Besides, you'll do credit." Erroll smiled.

"I can't quite square it with conscience," he said. "I don't rev know what I ought to do-but-I've thought it over, Morny, and afraid I shall have to clear out Rookwood."

"What rot!" exclaimed Morni ton. "I should miss you. Look he Erroll, your fees are paid for term, and you're going in for scholarship to pay your own after that. You can do it."

"My fees were paid by Gentlen Jim in Captain Erroll's name. know how he gets his money," Erroll, in a low voice.

"But it can't be handed back n By gad," exclaimed Morning "you're not thinking of telling Head!"

"I've been thinking whether ought to."

"It means clearin' out of school."

Erroll nodded

nosing over it, but Peele didn't want

THE

Mornington moved to and fro restlessly in the study. He was plainly perturbed.

Strange enough as it was that the reckless dandy of the Fourth should have chummed up with the son of Gentleman Jim, it was a very real friendship that had grown up between the two.

Mornington knew the whole of Erroll's dark story-of his boyhood passed in seclusion and shadow-of his determined and successful resistance to the cracksman's efforts to draw him from the path of honour and honesty. Erroll had told him all.

He believed, as Erroll firmly believed, that Gentleman Jim was not the junior's father, as he claimed.

Now that Erroll had broken for ever with the cracksman, the shadow had lifted from his life-if only Gentleman Jim left him in peace.

Erroll was clever and a hard worker, and there was every chance of his gaining a scholarship to enable | at Erroll's crimson face. him to remain at Rookwood by his own efforts. But if the truth had chill of doubt came into Jimmy's come out-if the defeated cracksman, in revenge, betrayed him-what then?.

That was the worst that was to be feared. Gentleman Jim had placed the boy at the school, intending to use him for his own purposes—to rob the school, in the first place. That alone meant a haul that would be a small fortune to the cracksman. And Erroll had refused, fiercely, and had repudiated the rascal who called himself his father, for ever.

"Look here, Erroll," said Mornington at last, "there's no need for you to jaw to the Head, take my word about that! Gentleman Jim may never turn up again, now that he knows you're done with him. It may | warene never come out."

Erroll shook his head.

"He will turn up, and soon," he said. "I was placed here to help him rob Rookwood. I was to get invitations to fellows' homes, and give him other chances there. He had it all cut and dried. He thought he would force me, by threatening to show me up here, if I refused. He will not let me off scot-free, Morny. Besides, he will not give up the idea of robbing Rookwood. Every night I expect him to come."

"Good gad!"

"I have remained awake many times, listening," said Erroll, his cheeks flushing. "I know that he will! come. And when he comes, Morny, I'm going to stop him if I can. Butbut can I chance all that? I know I ought to speak to the Head, and put him on his guard." 'And be turned out of Rookwood!"

"I suppose that would follow." "You're not goin' to do it!" said

Mornington angrily. There was a tap at the door. Mornington uttered an impatient exclamation, but Erroll said quietly: "Come in!"

Jimmy Silver entered the study with a newspaper in his hand. "News here about your pater, Erroll!" he said cheerily. Erroll started. "About whom?" he muttered.

"Captain Erroll. He sailed for America, didn't he?" "Yes." "Well, he's back in England."

"Safe and sound," said Jimmy Silver at once. "Nothing to worry about, Erroll. The steamer was sunk by a Hun submarine, but the paper says he's landed safely. Here it is." Erroll's face was crimson. Hardest of all to bear, in his strange situation, was the hateful, implied deceit of his position in the presence of the cheery confidence of Jimmy Silver & Co.

"Yes.

Jimmy Silver and his chums had scouted the suggestion that Erroll was not the son of the man whose name he bore. Erroll avoided the subject as much as he could, writhing inwardly whenever it was mentioned. But his silent assent was deceit, as he realised only too keenly.

and he had made many friends there. | were grinning, as over some good But it was borne in more and more | joke. All the fellows looked curious. upon his mind that this could not go on-that he must have openness and lasked Jimmy Silver, looking round. truth, however heavy the price he paid for it.

He read the marked paragraph, and handed the newspaper back to Jimmy Silver, who was eyeing him oddly.

"Thank you, Jimmy!" he said. "Didn't you know?" asked Jimmy. | here." "No."

"Oh, I thought your pater would have written!""

"I have had no letter." "Then that's jolly good news to did!" start.

Erroll to see it, for some reason," said the captain of the Fourth. "The fact is, Morny, your pals seem to have taken up that old yarn you used to spin about Erroll, and they're trying to make something out of it." "The rotten cads!" growled Mornington. Jimmy Silver laughed.

"Well, they're only following your example," he said. "Still, they're cads, there's no doubt about that. It really seems as if that yarn will never die out, at this rate. I'll tell you what, Erroll!" "Yes, Jimmy?"

"Ask your father to come down to ! the school, as he's still in England," said Jimmy Silver. "I dare say he can do it all right. That will knock the silly rot right on the head, if Captain Erroll comes here!"

"Oh, rot!" muttered Mornington. Jimmy Silver gazed in amazement

As had happened once before, a honest heart.

"That's a good tip, Erroll," he said quietly. "It will clear up the matter for good and all, if Captain Erroll | find out from his answer whether he's ! comes to Rookwood, and all the fellows see him. I should advise you to do that."

And Jimmy left the study. Erroll looked at Mornington.

he got it for me. And then I wired to Captain Erroll. Nice telegram, in perfectly good taste, pointin' out that his son's friends were awfully anxious to see him, because of his gallant conduct in Flanders, an' gettin' the D.S.O. Askin' him if he couldn't come down to Rookwood before he sailed next time, because his son's pals were so anxious to see him. Nothin' to complain of in that, was there?"

BOYS' FRIEND

"Well, no," said Jimmy Silver. "Only you're not a friend of Erroll's." "If Captain Erroll's his father, no harm's done," grinned Peele. "He'll take it as a schoolboy compliment. But if the merry captain hasn't got a son at Rookwood, it will be rather a surprise-what?"

"You rotter!" shouted Mornington. "What are you complainin' about?" said Peele coolly. "Don't you want Erroll shown up, if he's an impostor? You were keen enough on it at one tonelessly.

"Ha, ha, ha!" roared the nuts, in chorus.

Erroll's face was deadly pale. "Captain Erroll's bound to answer my wire," grinned Peele. "We'll got a son here, or whether a rotten cracksman has planted his son here under a false name, as Morny used to declare!"

"Ha, ha, ha!"

The laugh was against the plotting Fourth-former.

Jimmy Silver, still laughing, hurried away to Erroll's study. He found him pale and troubled.

"Right as rain, old fellow," said Jimmy. "Your pater's coming down to-morrow morning early."

Erroll gave him a strange look. "How do you know?" he asked

Jimmy chuckled. "He's wired back to Peele. Rather queer he didn't wire to you instead. But it's come to Peele, and it says he's arriving early in the morning. Of course, he doesn't guess that it was a cad asked him, for a rotten trick. No need to tell him that, either!"

"Well, it's a good thing Erroll's pater's coming," said Higgs, looking up from his prep. "It will stop the jaw about Erroll."

"A very good thing," said Erroll

Peele," said Jimmy, looking queerly were still sleeping soundly as the at Erroll's colourless face. "But you'll be glad to see your pater, Erroll, won't you?"

Erroll nodded, and Jimmy left the study with that old chill of strange | wind of the summer night blew fresh doubt in his breast again. Why did | upon his face. Erroll look like that? Jimmy Silver asked himself the question, without being able to find an answer.

Erroll had been working at his "You see," he said, in a low voice, | "You needn't mind, Erroll," said | prep; but he did not resume it when | "I-I can't keep it up. I can't be Jimmy Silver. "No harm done if Jimmy was gone. He remained idle on account of that strange likeness. He was coming, and the imposture would be discovered!

One thought was borne in upon the boy's mind, he must go! No need to wait and face out the shame and humiliation of exposure. Before Captain Erroll arrived at Rookwood, he must be gone.

Erroll was not seen again by the Rookwood juniors till bed-time. He came into the dormitory of the Classical Fourth, with a face that was a little pale, but set and calm. His mind was made up. When all the school was sleeping, he was to leave Rookwood—quietly, and the discovery that now must come would come after he had gone for ever.

Long after the rest of the Fourth were asleep, Erroll lay with wideopen, sleepless eyes, while the hours passed. It was at midnight that he slipped quietly from his bed, and dressed in "Of course, it's a rotten cheek of the darkness. The Classical Fourth hunted junior closed the dormitory door quietly behind him. A few minutes more, and he had dropped softly from a window, and the cool

The 6th Chapter. The Last Blow!

Clink!

Erroll stopped, his heart beating violently.

He was skirting the great building, with silent footfalls, in the dim starlight, to cross to the wall on the road, when that faint sound struck his ears, faint, but clear, in the silence of the night.

His heart beat almost to suffocation as he listened, breathing hard.

One thought rushed into his mind as he listened to that sound from the lower hall window, in the dark recess of the School House porch. "Gentleman Jim!"

He stood as if rooted to the ground for some minutes. He knew that the clink was of a fragment of glass, that had fallen from a pane under the penetrating diamond of the cracksman. Gentleman Jim had come at last! Every night Erroll had feared it-had dreamed of it! Now, on his last night at Rookwood, the cracksman had come-and the unhappy lad breathed a prayer of thankfulness that it was still in his power to save the old school from the lawless hand of the thief and outcast.

There was no fear in his heart as he stepped silently towards the porch. He knew-none better-the desperate nature of the cracksman. He knew that death itself might be his lot! And he did not falter!

He stepped noiselessly into the porch. The little window by the door was open. The cracksman had reached the fastening within by removing a fragment of glass. The window was open, and within the dark building was the unseen thief of the night.

Erroll smiled bitterly in the gloom. He had been sent to Rookwood to help in this work—to make it safer for Gentleman Jim to carry out the robbery. And now he was there to baffle it. He stood for some moments in thought, undecided. Then he grasped the great bell-handle beside the door, and dragged upon it. Clang, clang, clang!

The sudden clanging of the bell rang with a din almost like thunder through the silent School House. Clang, clang, clang!

A light gleamed from a window above. There was a sound of an opening door. Clang, clang! The School House was awakened from end to end.

Even from outside the House, where he stood, Erroll could hear the sound of startled voices.

He let go the bell, and stepped to the open hall window. There was a sound within—a hurried footstep—a panting breath. A figure loomed up within the window-a white and savage face looked out in the dimness. Even in the dark Erroll knew the hard, desperate face of the man he had called his father!

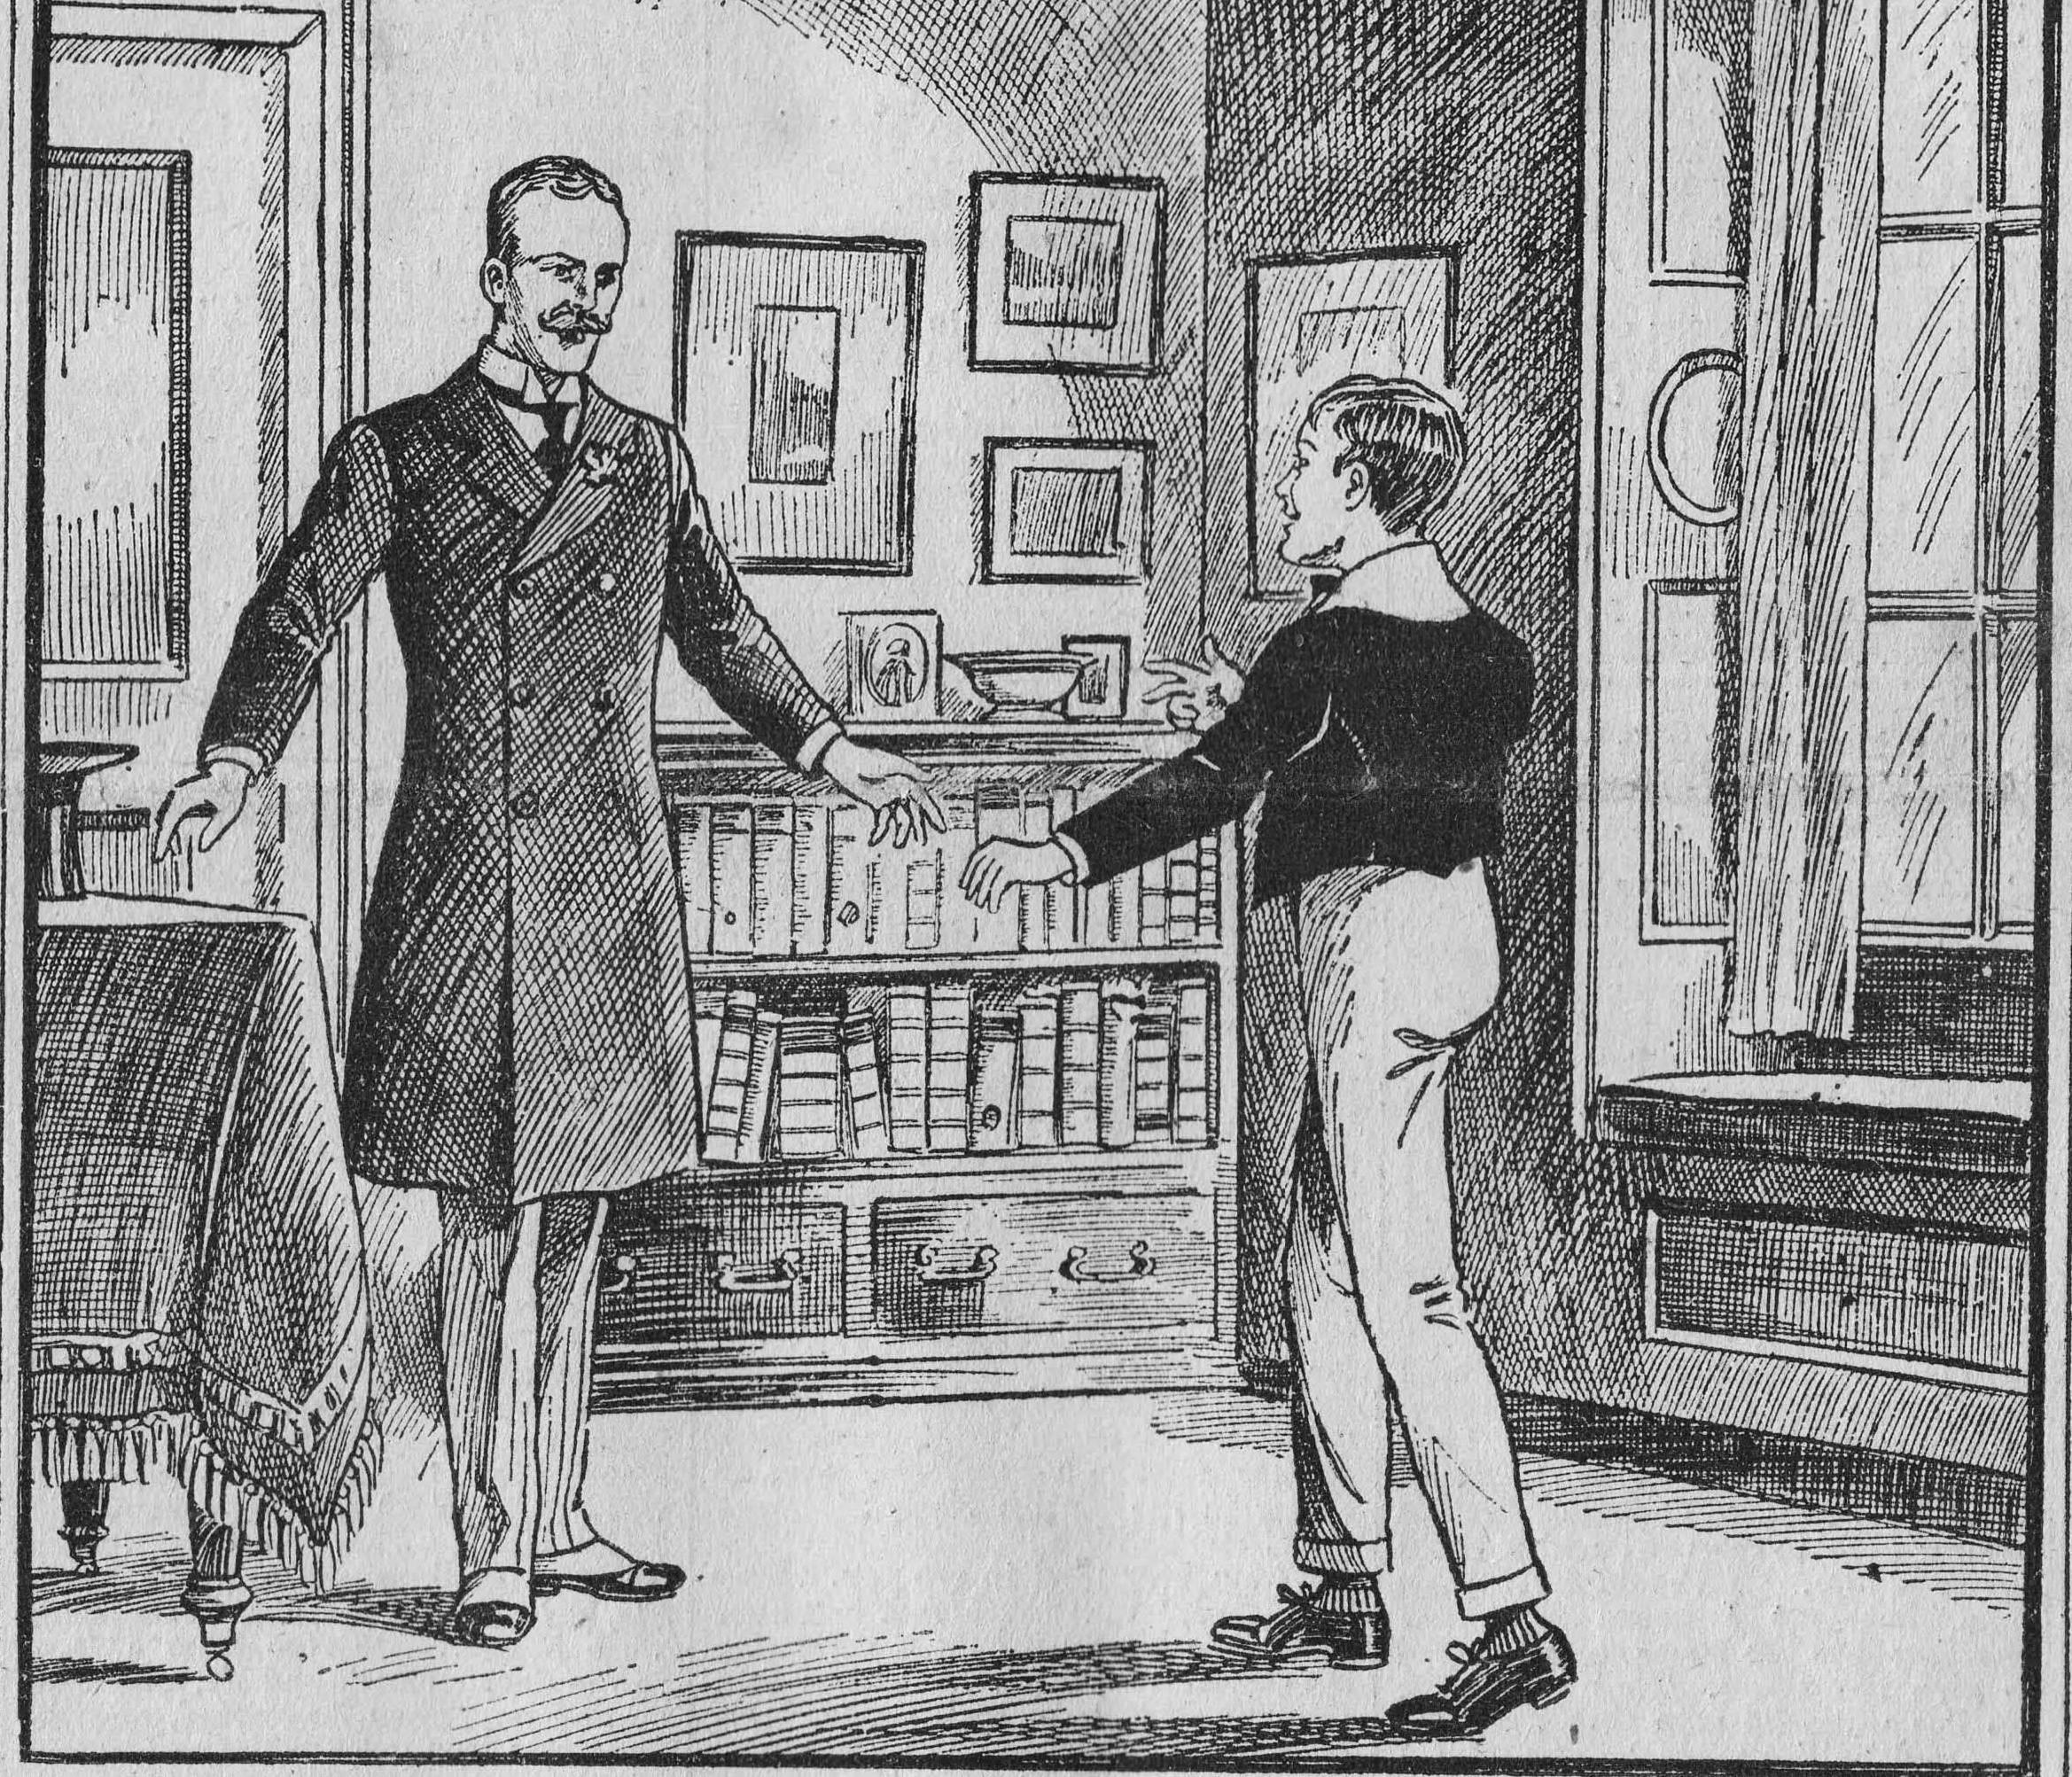

The alarm had been given, and the baffled cracksman was thinking only of escape. Already lights gleamed on

"Let him alone," said Erroll the stairs. But Gentleman Jim started back at the sight of the face without the window.

He panted. "You!"

He knew the schoolboy, even in out, Peele. The merry captain's The end had come, he knew that! the gloom. For a moment they looked at each other through the open lend me the paper, and I'm glad I Peele, with a mocking grin. "I've Looks as if he thinks he's got a son was coming to Rookwood in the window. Erroll's handsome face pala morning. The man he so strangely and tense-Gentleman Jim snarling

"My son," said Captain Erroll, "it was your own name that scoundrel gave you when he brought you here. He believed that I had gone back to Honduras, and It was safe to use my name—it is by chance that I was still in England—and have found my son!"

can't stand it!"

And Mornington was silent. He felt, too, that the junior was rightthat it could not last.

The 5th Chapter. Good-bye to Rookwood.

All eyes were turned upon Kit Erroll when he came into the junior Common-room that evening with He had grown to love Rookwood, Jimmy Silver & Co. Peele & Co.

> "Hallo! What's the merry joke?" "Your friend Erroll is!" chortled

Townsend. Rawson came over to Erroll.

"I hear your pater's in London, Erroll," he said, in his direct way. "Peele says he's wired to him to come Erroll started violently. "Why, you cheeky cad, Peele!" exclaimed Lovell. "What business is it of yours to wire to Erroll's pater?"

"Only to show whether Captain you!" said Jimmy. "I made Peele Erroll is Erroll's pater at all," said simply accepted the invitation! Captain Erroll, whose name he bore, told these fellows, an now I'll tell here, anyway!" "Peele!" said Mornington, with a | you. I telephoned to my cousin, who's got an Army job in Whitehall, Your merry pals were to get Captain Erroll's address; an' I crestfallen.

taking in fellows who trust me! I | your pater does come here. We'd all | for some minutes, with contracted like to see him." Erroll nodded without replying. | door.

With the pallor as of death in his face, he walked out of the Common-room. There was a buzz after he had gone.

rest of the juniors remained in excited discussion. When the school page came into the Common-room with a telegram in his hand, the excitement was very

"Master Peele!" "Here you are," smiled Peele. He took the telegram and opened | chap?

His brow grew a little perplexed as round him to read it, too.

"Arrivng Rookwood early morning.—Erroll."

"Well, my hat!" said Gower. Peele's jaw dropped.

"Ha, ha, ha!"

brows, and then rose and went to the "Finished?" yawned Jones minor.

"No; I don't think I shall finish." He left the study, and Mornington Mornington followed him, but the met him in the passage, his face pale and excited. "Erroll, you know-" muttered Mornington. "I know." "He's coming to-morrow morn-

"What are you going to do, old

"I've got to think that out." "I'll make Peele sit up for this he read. The other fellows crowded | trick, the cad!" muttered Mornington, clenching his hands.

> quietly. "I deserve it! It was bound to come, sooner or later." He went on by himself, and went out into the shadowed quadrangle.

Long, in the dim starlight, the un-"Ha, ha, ha!" roared Jimmy happy junior paced to and fro under Silver. "That rather knocks you the old beeches, thinking-thinking!

resembled, and whom he did not like a cornered wild beast. "By gad!" muttered Peele, utterly know-whose name had been chosen | "You!" The cracksman choked for him by Gentleman Jim. doubtless with rage. "You!"

The enraged cracksman had fired through the open window, and the bullet passed within a foot of the schoolboy, as he sprang aside. The next moment Gentleman Jim was scrambling, head-foremost, through

But as he did so, a strong grasp was

It was the deep voice of Bulkeley

There was a fierce struggle, and Gentleman Jim disappeared from the window, dragged back into the house by the stalwart Sixth-Former. Erroll heard the fierce struggle within, and he scrambled furiously in at the window, fearful of hearing again the cracksman's revolver. There was a flood of light in the hall. Mr.

Bootles was down, and he had switched on the electric light.

Bulkeley and the cracksman were struggling on the floor, and Gentleman Jim had freed his right hand to use his weapon. Erroll leaped upon him, and grasped his wrist, and turned the revolver to the floor. With a fierce twist of the wrist he forced the startled fellows. Jimmy Silver and Carthew of the Sixth ran forward and was the signal to the rest. A moment more, and twenty pairs of hands were

"Got him!" yelled Jimmy Silver.

"Bless my soul!" Mr. Bootles was

The crowd moved back as the Head of Rookwood, in dressing-gown and slippers, hurried on the scene. Dr.

Chisholm was startled, but very calm.

"A burglar, sir," said Bulkeley, gasping. "Dear me! Oh, bless my

"Sit on him!" shouted Lovell.

collared the struggling villain.

ruffian to drop the weapon.

on the cracksman.

"Hurrah!"

panting.

Mr. Bootles!"

chortled Lovell.

savage struggle.

turned upon him.

the bell?"

The Head eyed him grimly.

Erroll stood quiet, silent, with fellow there who was fully dressed.

and already curious glances were

"Someone gave the alarm," said

"It was I, sir," said Erroll quietly.

"You, Erroll! You are dressed!"

Dr. Chisholm frowned. "Is it possible, Erroll, that you were up at this hour of the night?"

of the Sixth, captain of Rookwood.

laid upon him from behind.

"I've got the rotter!"

"Here he is!"

Erroll started back.

Crack!

the window.

LAST!

Published

Every Monday

(Continued from the previous page.)

"I was in the quadrangle, sir, and I heard that man enter," said Erroll dully. "I gave the alarm at once."

"You have prevented a robbery," said the Head. "I shall inquire tomorrow, Erroll, how you came to be out of doors at such an hour. This man must be secured till the morning, when the police-"

There was a fierce exclamation from Gentleman Jim. His eyes burned at Erroll with deadly animosity. claimed hoarsely. "Let them take me, and let them take that boy at the same time! He is my son and accom-

"Wretch!" exclaimed the Head sternly. "How dare you!"

"It's the truth!" said Gentleman "Look at Jim, between his teeth. me, Dr. Chisholm-look at me, and you will remember my face! It was I who brought that boy to this schoolunder the name of Captain Erroll!"

The Head started violently. He bent forward, and scanned the sullen features of the cracksman, and his face became darker. Peele, on the staircase, pressed Townsend's arm.

"It's out now!" he whispered. "By gad, yes!" murmured Towns-"But what the thunder did Erroll give his pater away for?"

"It is true!" said the Head at last, in hard, icy tones. "I recognise you! You came to this school as Captain Erroll, bringing that boy with you. Who are you?"

"Gentleman Jim, the cracksman!" said the outcast, with a reckless laugh. "The father of that boy! We shall The stairs were crowded with go to prison together!"

"Erroll!" gasped Jimmy Silver. Erroll did not speak. His face was like stone. Mornington drew to his side, and slipped a hand through his arm. The unhappy lad gave a faint smile.

Dr. Chisholm fixed his eyes upon Erroll.

"You hear what this man says, Erroll." His voice was cold and "Yes, sir."

"Have you anything to say?" All eyes were upon the son of the cracksman. Erroll's head was drooping, but he raised it proudly.

"Only this, sir," he said, in a firm voice. "That man has told part of the truth. I was brought up as his "So I see, Bulkeley! Secure the son, but I never believed that he was man, but do not hurt him," said the my father. He tried to make a thief Head. "Take up that pistol, please, of me. He ill-used me because I would not consent. He placed me in "We've got the rotter, sir!" | this school, making me believe I was to be free of his influence here—that Gentleman Jim was dragged to his I I was to have a chance in life. He feet. With a dozen pairs of hands | deceived me. He told me later that I upon him, the cracksman could not was to help him rob you—and others. even struggle. He stood, panting, I broke with him then for ever. I left with flaming eyes, exhausted by the my dormitory this night to leave planter in British Honduras, later an Rookwood, because Captain Erroll is officer in the British Army?" coming here to-morrow, and I could not face him. I should have been gone, but-but I heard that man deadly pale face. He was the only breaking into the house, and I stayed to give the alarm. That is all, sir. He lies when he says that I am his son, and he lies when he says that I the Head. "Who was it that rang ! am his accomplice. I have never been a thief!"

There was a quiet dignity in Erroll's look and in his tone that carried conviction with it. A deep silence followed his words. It was broken by a scoffing laugh from Gentleman Jim.

"A likely story! I repeat-" "Silence!" exclaimed the Head sternly. "That the lad is not your accomplice is proved by the fact that he has prevented your crime. Bulkeley, take that man to the cellars, and see that he is secured for the night."

"Yes, sir." Gentleman Jim was led away by half a dozen of the Sixth, darting a last malevolent glance at Erroll as he

"Erroll," said the Head, after a long pause, "this matter must be inquired into. I forbid you to leave Rookwood. You will return to your dormitory. My boys, you may go back to bed."

"Let me go, sir!" said Erroll. "I have done you a service, which helps to make up for the wrong I have done -unintentionally, Heaven knows!-in | covered." His voice faltered a "Send for the police!" he ex- deceiving you. I cannot remain at little. "I have never given up hope. Rookwood. Let me go now!"

Dr. Chisholm shook his head. "You must not go, Erroll. I shall hear your story in full in the morning, and will decide what is to be done with you. For the present, go back to bed."

Erroll bowed his head. "Very well, sir!"

Mornington kept his arm as they went up the stairs. In the dormitory there was a scoffing chuckle from Peele, and Jimmy Silver turned upon the cad of the Fourth with fierce eyes.

"Silence!" he said, between his teeth. "One word to Erroll, and I'll smash you!"

And Peele & Co. thought it better to be silent. There was no word from Kit Erroll as he turned in. was long ere sleep visited his eyes.

The 7th Chapter. Dick Erroll Finds His Father.

"Captain Erroll!" Dr. Chisholm rose to greet the handsome soldierly man who was Head. shown into his study.

It was early morning, and the Head's look showed his surprise at so early a visit. Dr. Chisholm had barely breakfasted when the captain's card was brought in. He received him in his study. The captain's handsome, sunburnt face was pale, and as the Head glanced at it, the strange resemblance to Erroll of the Fourth struck him forcibly.

"I beg you to excuse this early call, Dr. Chisholm." manner was courtly, though hurried. "You are doubtless aware of the telegram I received yesterday from this school-"

"I was not aware of it!" said the Head, in astonishment.

"A telegram from someone named Peele," said the captain. "A schoolboy. I presume. It was stated in this telegram that my son's friends wished me to visit Rookwood. I replied that I would come early in the morning. As I have, of course, no son at Rookwood. I should have taken the telegram for a foolish practical joke, but for one reason-" He paused. "One moment," said the Head. "You are Captain Erroll, formerly a

"Certainly!" "I am very glad to see you. Pray be seated," said the Head. "Your name has been used by a most conscienceless scoundrel. A month ago, Captain Erroll, a man came here. under your name, to place his son in the school. I had previously been in written communication with him, and had not the slightest doubt that he was the man he professed to be. I have since made the discovery that this man is a criminal, and, in fact, spoke at last. he attempted to rob the school last night, and is now in custody here awaiting the arrival of the police."

"By gad!" said the captain, in astonishment. "The boy he called his son was the means of his being defeated in his attempt upon the school. That boy bears your name, and was-until last night-supposed to be your son, by all Rookwood."

"That explains the telegram, then," said the captain, tugging at his moustache. "I came here - foolishly enough, perhaps-with a vague hope. I have no son, Dr. Chisholm. But had a son. He was stolen from me in early childhood, and I was never able to trace him. This telegram went to my heart-like a dagger. It gave birth to a hope, foolish enough, as I see I now, that perhaps something had been heard of my boy-something disthough ten years have passed since I have seen my boy. I am sorry that I have troubled you, sir."

"Not at all," said the Head. strange expression had come over the Head's kind old face. "You might ! care to see the boy who has borne He paused a your name here?" moment. "It is an extraordinary coincidence that he bears a most remarkable resemblance to you. Such a likeness I have seldom or never seen. Stay, I will send for him."

The Head touched the bell, and the page was sent for Erroll. In a few minutes the junior, pale and quiet, entered the study.

The captain rose to his feet, his eyes upon the schoolboy's face. His lips were trembling.

"Good heavens!" he muttered. He started towards the junior. "Boy! What is your name? Who are you?" "I do not know, sir," said Erroll quietly.

"You do not know!"

"This is Captain Erroll," said the

The junior started, and the crimson crept into his face.

"Do not be afraid, my boy," said the captain, his eyes still upon Erroll's flushed face. "From my heart I believe that Heaven has been merciful to me at last. You say you do not know your name?"

"I never knew it, sir." "Tell Captain Erroll your story," said the Head.

The junior obeyed. In few words The captain's he told it, as he had told Mornington -the strange life of the son of Gentleman Jim, of the hard fight he had fought to keep from following in the criminal's footsteps, of the belief always fixed in his mind that Gentleman Jim was not his father. The captain listened without interrupting him once. Erroll's voice died away at

> This man, Gentleman Jim, is still here?" he asked, turning to the Head.

> "Yes-I was about to telephone to the police, when you came-"

"Let me see him!" "Certainly. Remain here, Erroll." The captain followed Dr. Chisholm from the study. Erroll remained alone-silent and pale, but his heart i was beating with a strange hope. Gentleman Jim, in the locked cellar, turned savagely as he heard the key grate in the lock. His hands were bound. He rose from a stool as the door opened, and Dr. Chisholm rustled in. Then he started, and his that from the shadows of the past he away.

Erroll strode in. His eyes gleamed like a hunted animal's as he backed

"James Stanton!" he said.

shrugged his The cracksman shoulders.

"Gentleman Jim, at your service," he said.

"I have found you at last," said the captain, quietly. He turned to the Head. "Ten years ago, Dr. Chisholm, I was a young lieutenant, and this man-James Stanton-was in my regiment. He was discovered selling military information to a German agent, and it was I who exposed him. He fled, a ruined man, and a month later I received a letter from him. He had revenged himself by stealing my little son. He told me, in his letter, that the boy was to be placed in the hands of thieves to be brought up a thief. That was his revenge upon me. I sought him for years in vain-till I lost all hope, and went out to the colonies, giving up hope at last. And this is the man who brought that lad to the school."

"This is the man!" "It is enough!" said Captain Erroll. "James Stanton, I can almost forgive you now-now that I have found my son!"

"You have found him!" muttered the cracksman. "You have found him-but beware; you have not done with Gentleman Jim yet!"

The captain quitted him without replying. His fact was bright-years of age seemed to have dropped away from him. It was the call of duty that had brought him home from a distant colony to fight for the old flag-and it was so that he had found his son! Erroll, in the Head's study, was waiting-when the captain came in. He held out his hand to the boy. "My son!" he said softly.

Erroll stood, with catching breath. "It was your own name that the scoundrel gave you, my boy, when he brought you here," said the captain, as he took the junior's hands. "Your own name! He believed that had gone back to Honduras, and it was safe to use my name—it is by chance, or rather by Heaven's mercy, that I was still in England-and have found my son! My son!"

Only one word fell from Erroll's trembling lips! "Father!"

It was a nine days' wonder at Rookwood. Jimmy Silver & Co. rejoiced when they heard the news-and Mornington almost danced with satisfaction. Only Peels of the Fourth looked Gentleman Jim was taken away by men in blue; and in the strong grip of the law he was not likely to give more trouble to the gallant soldier whom he had so cruelly wronged, or to the boy who had suffered so much from his revengeful rascality. He was gone from Erroll's life.

Erroll of the Fourth, as even the nuts had to admit how, was not the son of a cracksman—he was the son of Captain Erroll, the brave soldier to whom he had been so strangely restored. There was no more thought of his leaving Rookwood. The shadow of the past had been lifted—the future lay before him bright and sunnythe reward of the long struggle he had made for honour and right. And in his happiness he fully forgave those who had schemed against himand, indeed, he could afford to forgive Peele of the Fourth-for it was due to Pecle's cunning scheme that he had, at last, found his father, and desperate face grew white as Captain | had come into the light at last.

THE END.

(Another splendid long, complete Captain Erroll strode to him, and tale of Jimmy Silver & Co. in next scanned his face in grim silence. He | Monday's Boys' FRIEND, entitled: "The Trick That Failed!"

MOW ON SALE!

IN THE BOYS' FRIEND LIBRARY

IN THE

BLAKE

No. 381. THE LAND OF TERROR! A Splendid Tale of Adventure. By DUNCAN STORM. No. 382. CHUMS OF THE RIVER! A Magnificent Story of the River. By H. T. JOHNSON.

No. 383. AFTER LIGHTS OUT! A Ripping School Yarn. By MARTIN CLIFFORD. No. 384. THE IVORY BOX; or, Cast on the World! A Thrilling Story of Mystery. By the Author of "King of the Fags," etc., etc.

No. 33. THE HOUSE WITH THE DOUBLE MOAT; or, The Tattooed Man!

Author of "Nipper's Note-Book." No. 34. THE BLOCKADE RUNNERS; or, The Case

A Tale of Sexton Blake, Tinker, and Pedro. By the of the Mexican Mystery! A Thrilling Tale of Intrigue. By the Author of

"In Triple Disguise." PRICE 3d. PER VOLUME! ON SALE EVERYWHERE.

WEEK AFTER NEXT!

"CRUSOE ISLAND!"

An Amazing New Series of Complete Stories, introducing Dick and Frank Polruan and Old Joe Tremorne, by MAURICE EVERARD, will appear in the BOYS' FRIEND,

ALSO FOR

WHE BOYS OF THE BOMBAY CASTLE!"

A Magnificent New Serial by DUNCAN STORM.