THIS is the Paper YOU Have Been Looking For!

No. 1,008. Vol. XX. New Series ] THREE HALFPENCE.

[Week Ending October 2nd, 1920.

STAMPEDING THE HORSES!

In the midst of the din a yell went up. "The horses—it's a stampade !" Like thunder came the sound of countiess galloging hoofs. A flaring rocket and been thrown into the correl amongst the horses—and the correl gates were wide open! The Hightened animals poured through the gates in a terrified galloping mob that no man could have stopped.

The 1st Chapter. Startling News!

Chunky Todgers joined Frank Richards & Co. as they arrived at the gates of Cedar Creek School in the fine Soptember morning.

"Heard the news?" he inquired.
"Anything new?" asked Frank Richards, with a smile.
Chunky was always the earliest with news at the backwoods school in the Thompson Valley.
Chunky grinned with satisfaction. Evidently the Co. hadn't heard the news; and he was to have the pleasured imparting it, and startling them with it.
"I guess so!" he said. "I guess with it.

"I guess so!" he said. "I guess it's exciting too!"

"What's happened?" yawned Bob-Lawless. "Price of maple sugar gone up? I reckon you would find that exciting!"

Chunky sniffed.

"It's jolly serious!" he said.

"Well, 'out with it!" remarked Yers Beauclare. "Don't keep us in suspanse, Chunky!"

"There's been a raid!" said Chunky Todgers impressively.

"I was a state raid and a state raid and the chums of Cedar Creek cluckled again.

"Braw it mild, old chap!"

"Frozen truth!" said Chunky triumphanly. "I knew it would make you jump. A cattle-raid in the Thompson Valley! What do you think of that?"

To Chunky's surprise and exasperation, the chums burst into a laugh. Chunky stared at them.

"Train't a laughing matter!" he exclaimed warmly. "The Lawrence's homestead has been raided, and cattle driven off! Anything happed at Lawless Ranch last night, Bob?"

"Ha, ha! No."

"Your haven't seen anything of the cattle-lifters there?"

"Not a hide nor a hair!" said Bob Lawless chucking. "And I guess! don't expect to see any cattle-lifters this side of the border, Chunky! Give us an easier one!"

"Why, you jay, don't you believe me!" exclaimed Chunky indignantly.

"Not quite! Did you dream if?"

"Nope! It's the colld, frozen the bodden was a raid on the law and the columns of Cedar Creek chunky and the tuckled again.

"Go it!"

"A dozen stears were driven off and "Pile it on!"

"And stockman knocked on the head—"

"Nope: just knocked on the head—"

"You could improve on the head—"

"Why, you jay, don't you believe me!" exclaimed Chunky indignantly.

"Not quite! Did you dream if?"

"Thaw it out, and tell us how much there is in it!" suggested Bob Lawless humorously. "Boil it down, and give us the facts. Has one of the Lawrences' steers wandered away finto the timber?" "That's about it!" grinned Frank Richards. "Oh, you're a jay, Richards!" said Chunky Todgers, testily. "You galoots never hear any news out on the ranch. I can tell you all Thompson is jawing over it this morning! When I came through Main Street, on my way to school, there was a crowd nound Gunten's Store, taking it carly cleared out. The Lawrences have the time when the same and the same cardy cleared out of the throng way cavorting round here. I tell you there's a gang of cattle-lifters in the valley—"Bow-wow!"

Frank Richards & Co. walked on to the correal leading their horses.

"Bow-wow!"
Frank Richards & Co. walked on to the corral, leading their borses, leaving Chunky Todgors in a state of great exasperation. It was really too bad, to be-full of exciting news; and to find his hearers in the same sceptical state as doubting Thomas of old.

Frank Richards & Co. were still smiling as they put up their horses, and came across the playground towards that the control of the control of indeed.

But, to their surprise, as they came up to the schoolhouse, they found a crowd of excited schoolboys gathered outside the porch, discussing the news. Tom Lawrence was in the middle of the group, and he was talking. The chums heard his words as they came

"It was nearly a clean sweep— steers and horses gone——" "What's that?" howled Bob Lawless.

A dozen voices answered him.
"It's a raid—"
"Cattle-lifters—"

"Haven't you heard—"
"My only hat!" ejaculated Frank Richards. "Then, it's true!"
"True drough," said Tom Lawrence. There was a raid on our shebang last night, and the stock was non on the head, and he crawfed up to the farmhouse to give the alarm, but when we all turned out, the cattle was gone, and the raiders with them."
"Great Jerusalem!" exclaimed Bob Lawless. "Cattle-lifters in this valley! It beats the Dutch!"
"And they haven't been found?" asked Frank.
Lawrence shook his head.

"And they haven't been found?" asked Frank.
Lawrence shook his head.
"No fear! My father and brother were out at dawn looking for them, and I rode into Thompson to tell the sheriff. Mr. Henderson's out with his men. He reckons it's a gang from over the line. The stockman saw five or six of the raceals, at least, and not a man he knew among them. We might have thought it was some of the Red Dog crowd; but the stockman's sure they were all strangers in this section. He put up his rifle, and the leader gave him a sock dolager on the category with his whip-butt, and laid him? "Phaw" if the leader say the min sock dolager on the category with his whip-butt, and laid him?" Phaw "I have "The were a section."

"Phew!"
"What did I tell you, you galoots?"
howled Chunky Todgers indignantly.
"I tell you Thompson is fairly buzzing with it. There hasn't been anything like it in the valley for a dozen years!"

years!"
"I guess I thought it was one of Chunky's yarns!" said Bob. "I reckon, though, the scallywags won't find that game pay in the Thompson Valley! They'll be run down before night!"
"I home sa"

vaney! Inpy it be run down before might!"

"I hope so," said Lawrence. "It will be pretty serious for us if we don't get our stock back!"

The school bell rang, and the Cedar Creek fellows went in to lessons. Miss Meadows had rather a difficult task with her pupils that morning.

The surprising news had startled and thrilled the school, and most of the fellows were thinking about the cattle-litters, instead of their lessons.

At discontinue Frank Richards &

the fellows were thinking about the cattle-lifters, instead of their lessons.

At dimer-time Frank Richards & Co. mounted their horses, and galloped to Thompson, fully expecting to hear there that the raiders had been run down by the sheriff.

But there was a crowd at Gunten's Store, eagerly discussing the event; and, from the talk, the event and, from the talk, the center tracked the store of the store of the store of the talk and been lost in the rocked the store of the foot-hills.

They returned to Cedar Creek in a serious mood.

"By gun!" said Bob Lawless, "If the scallywags get clear off with their plunder they may try the same game on again. We may see them at our auch next. But I guess Billy Cook and the boys would give them a warm reception!"

"I suppose they've got the cattle hidden safely enamely in the kills."

and the boys would give them a warm reception!"

"I suppose they've got the cattle hidden safely enough in the hills," said Frank, "If they're not found, the whole section will turn out to the job, same as they did when Five-Hunrded. Dollar Jones was here. But they'll Nebraska. They can't play that game for long in Carada!"

There was much suppressed excitement at Cedar Creek school that afternoon. All the school was relieved when lessons were over at last, and the fellows were free to disperse and learn the latest news of the cattle-raiders.

The 2nd Chapter. Roped In!

Look out on your way home, you

"Look out on your way galoots!"
Chunky Todgers called out to Frank Richards & Co. as the chuns of Cedar Creek led their horses down to the gates after school.

to the gates after school.

"Look out for what?" asked Frank.
"I guess you're going on a lonely trail," said Chunky. "You may run into some of those bulldozers—"

"Not likely," said Frank, with a smile.

"Not likely," said Frank, with a smile.

Most of the fellows went home by way of the Thompson trail. But Frank Richards & Co.'s way lay through the timber to the south, and it was a lonely trail in the falling Sentember duals did not feel uneasy. However, as they trotted away under the ceders and first the contract of the contract o cattlemen who watched the herds were sometimes absent from the ranch for days and night together. But on the loneliest stretches of the great range a rancher had no fear for the safety of his beasts. Cattle-lifting was not an avocation in much favour on the Canadian side of the Line. There had been isolated cases, but they were few.

Halt! "Halt!"

Published Every Monday

"Halt!"
The sudden call came from the shadows of the trail ahead, and it startled the schoolboys. The word was followed by the click of a rifle-leak

k. Why — what ——"

"Thunder!"

"Halt!" repeated the rough voice.

A man in buckskin loomed out of the shadows of the cedars, with a rifle to his shoulder.

The muzel bore full upon the two schoolboys, and they drew rein at once.

schoolboys, and they drew rein at once.

They knew enough of western customs to be aware that there was no argument with a levelled rifle.

They stared at the rough-bearded man in buckskin.

"What the thump does this mean?" exclaimed Frank Richards.

"What are you stopping us for?"

"Light down!"

"Gift off'n then critters—sharp!" rapped out the man in buckskin.

"Quick, now, or this trigger may go!"

go!"
He made a threatening motion with the rifle.

Frank and Bob exchanged a glance

Frank and Hob exchanged a glance and dismounted. The man in buck-skin, keeping the rifle levelled, called out:

"Jo! Mexican Jo!"

"Jo! Mexican Jo!
"Si, amigo."
A dark-skinned Mexican came out of the cedars.
"Hyer's two more!" grinned the man in buckskin, "Rope 'em up with the others."

Si."
What the thunder is this game

"What the thunder is this game?" exclaimed Bob Lawless indignantly. "Who the dickens are you?" It guess they call me Buck Benson when I'm to home," drawled the man in buckskin. "Put up your hands!" What are you stopping us for!" The man in buckskin grunned. "This hyer trail is stopped," he explained. "Nobody ain't allowed to pass without orders."

"This hyer trail is stopped," he explained. "Nobody ain't allowed to pass without orders."
"Whose orders."
"The captain's." repeated Frank Richards blankly. "What captain?"
"I calculate you're asking too many questions, sonny. How long aire you going to be with that rope, Mexican Jo. I allow there may be more galoots along the trail arter this crowd."

crowd."

"My hat!" breathed Frank Richards, with a startled glance at his Canadian cousin. "It must be the cattle-lifters, Bob."
Bob Lawless nodded grimly. Bob Lawless nodded grimly. He had altrady guessed that.

"And they're stopping all travellers going towards the ranch, Frank," he muttered. "That means."

"It means that there's a raid ou the ranch."

"It means that there's a raid outhe ranch."
"I guess so."
Frank's heart thumped.
The stopping of the trail could mean nothing else. It could only mean that while Buck Benson and the Mexican held off all comers, their associates were at work farther south on the Lawless Ranch, or were prevening for the raid.

associates were a work rative source on the Lawless Ranch, or were preparing for the raid. Both set his teeth. But there was no help for it; the levelled rife was enough. Mexican Jo, with a grin on his swarthy face, looped a rope round the writss of the two schoolboys, and knotted it. With the end of the rata in his dusky hand he plunged into the wood again.

Bards Benson waved the schoolboys a mocking farewell as they disappeared into the trees after the Mexican.

Frank and Bob followed the dark-

Mexican.

Mexican Bob followed the dark-skinned ruffian in silence.

He led them a couple of hundred years the tendent of the timber, where they had been a shadowy glade.

The glade was not unteranted.

Two horses were tehered there, and three men could be seen, dimly, bound to trues.

Frank peered at them in the gloom, and recognised them.

Frank peered at them in the goods, and recognised them.
One was Mr. Penrose, the editor and publisher of the "Thompson Press"; another was Chu Chung, the Chinese laundryman, and the third was Dry Billy Bowers, the best customer of the Red Pog saloon, in customer of the Red Dog saloon, in Thompson Town.

"Hallo! We've got company!" re-marked Bob Lawless grimly.

"You kids here!" exclaimed Mr.
Ponrose. "I was reckoning you'd be noseying along the trail about this meesping along the trail about this time. They've got you.

They've got you.

They've got you.

I guess the service greed Frank.

I guess the service greed Frank.

I guess the service greed the decironal gentlemandismally. "There's mischief adoot farther south, and they've stopped the trail, to keep off interference. I guess there's going to be a cattle-raid on your popper's ranch, young Lawless."

"I guess so," said Bob.

The Moxican ran the rista round the tree to which Mr. Penrose was ticed, and knotted it again. Frank and Bob were now secured to the tree as well as the editor of the Thompson Press.

Leaving them there, the Mexican Leaving them there, the Mexican plunged away through the trees again, towards the trail, after tethering the schoolboys horses.

"How long have you been here, Mr. Penrose?" asked Frank.
"Over an hour," said Mr. Penrose gloomily. "I was riding over to Silver Creek when they roped me in. I guess I was surprised some. But, after all, there's good business in this." The editorial gentleman brightened a little. "This will make something lively for the next number—" "The next what?"

with the control of t

in Direct Peril!

Bob Lawless' whisper came softly through the silence of the dusky glade.

glade.
"Yes, Bob?"
"We've got to get out of this, somehow!" whispered Bob. "You know why they've held up the trail-there's some devil's work going on farther south. They don't know we've guessed theri little game. They haven't started in yet st the rach..."

don't know we've guessed their little game. They haven't started in yet at the ranch—"
"How do you know that, Bob?"
I' guess there will be shooting; popper isn't the man 'to let those rustlers run off his steers without pulling a trigger," said Bob. "If there was shooting, I guess we should hear it from here; the wind's in this direction."

ihere was shooting. I guess we should hear it from here; the wind's in this direction."

"That's so."

"Besides, they're bound to wait till after dark. I reckon, and it's barely dark here; quite light on the plains yet," said Bob. "It would be too risky for the galoots till after the sun's well down. If we could get loose, Frank, there's still time to put propper on his guard."

Frank gave a wrench at his bonds. He breathed hard.

"It's no go, Bob!"

"We've got to get out somehow!"

"utered Bob resolutely.

"Go easy!" came from Mr. Penrose. "I guess that galoot on the trail would pull trigger fast enough. You don't want to be turned into contest means, shouldn't go by the trail. I reckon I could worm through the timber without those rustlers being any the wiser. Can you get your hands loose, Mr. Penrose."

you get your Penrose?"

you ges.

"Nope."
"Nope."
"What about you, Chu Chung?"
The Chinaman gave a whimper.
"Me velly toghyt tie," he replied.
"No can loosen. Me velly pool ole Chinee; velly bad Molican man teat pool ole Chine like this!"
"Br-r-! How are you fixed,

Bowers?"
Dry Billy grunted.
"I guess I'm fixed till the cows come home," he answered. "Them galoots ain't taking any chances, I calkerlate. It's hard on me, I recken. They say that dorg don't eat dorg, yet them galoots hev gone for me. I can tell you, young Lawless, I'm as thirsty as a fish. I'd give all the gold on the Yukon for a long strong drink!" "Oh, rats!" growled Bob.

It was evident that the chums of Cedar Creek had to depend only on themselves, if they were to get free and give warring at the ranch of the intended raid.

But they strongeled with the rawhide cord in vain.

Mexican Jo had done his work too well.

But may struggled with the rawhide cord in vain.

Mexican Jo had done his work too well.

Bob Lawless tried his teeth on the rawhide, but it defied them; he made scarcely any impression on it by the time his jaws were aching.

"There's a knife in my pocket, rank," he muttered, at last. "If we could get it out—
"How!" said Frank hopelessly.
"How!" said Frank hopelessly.
"How!" said Frank hopelessly.
It was not easy for Frank Richards to get his teeth on the lining of the facket; it was difficult to get at the spot at all. He nuzzled into the spot at all. He nuzzled into the spot and felt the bulge of the clasp-knife that hay in the pocket. At last he succeeded in crumpling the jacket lining in his teeth, and gnuwed.

But the jacket was strongly lined;
the tore at it fill his teeth ached, but he was almost in despair of success, when the lining tore at last. He secured a fresh grip on the torn edge and tore it farther. A hole was torn in the pocket from the inside of the fallen knife, and he felt it under his knee. By stooping apinfully he was able to pick it up in his teeth.

The knife still had to be opened.

But Bob could get his hands, bound as they were, to his mouth, and he took the knife in his fingers and opened the blade with his teeth.

The he gripped the handle of the knife in his teeth, and sawed his bolds. It was a fatiguing task, but it was successful. The rawhide parted at

It was a fatiguing task, but it was successful. The rawhide parted at last over the keen edge. Bob breathed hard as the rope fell

Bob breathed hard as the rope ten apart.

"Free!" he whispered.

He gresped the knife now, and in a minute more had cut Frank Richards loose.

They stepped away from the tree, their hearts beating. No sound came from the trail, two hundred yards away, where Buck Benson and the Mexican were still watching for passers.

"You young galoots loose?" mur-mured Mr. Penrose. "I guess you can cut me loose now."
"Me, too!" murmured Chu

can cut me loose now."

"Me, too!" murmured Chu Chung.
"And me, I calkerlate," said Dry Billy Bowers. "I guess I ain't going to lose any time in getting a drint arter this."
"Keep quiet!" said Bob testily.
"I'll set you free; but if those rustlers hear a sound. I reckon they'll shoot. They won't let you carry the news to Thompson if they can help it."
Dry Billy chuckled.
"I guess I know that, young Lawless. I ain't making any toot. But jest you set a galoot free, so that he can go an' look for a long, strong drink."
Bob Lawless cut the three prisoners

Bob Lawless cut the three prisoners

Dry Billy plunged away at once through the timber, and he was followed by Chu Chung. Mr. Penrose paused a ninute. The Chinaman was leading his horse after him; Dry Billy was on foot. Mr. Penrose unloosed his horse.

"You're going to try for the ranch, Lawless?" he asked.

"Sure!"

ranch, Lawless!" he asked.

"Sure!"
"I guess you'd better strike for Thompson with me. There'll be more of that gang around, on the edge of the timber, and if they spot you it's a Canadian dollar to a Mexican pess that it's shoot."

"Yes e risking it's said Frank Richards.

"Well, I guess it's your own funeral," said Mr. Penroso. "If you went through, tell your popper that I'm giving the alarm in Thompson, and there'll be help as fast as horse-fesh can bring it."

"Good!" said Bob.

Mr. Penrose led his horse away in the direction opposite from the trail. Bob Lawless listened. There was no sound from the sound from the rustlers. Evidently the two ruffians had no suspicion that their prisoners were Evidently the two ruffians had no suspicion that their prisoners were loose again.

"What about the horses, Bob?" asked Frank. "We're pretty certain to be seen if we ride—"We're not going to ride," said Bob. "The horses will have to be left. I'll loose them, and they'll find thoir way home later; we're not leaving them for the rustlers." "Right!"

lace way nome sater; we're hot leaving them for the rustlers."
"Right!"
"Right!"
Bob cast the horses loose, and gave them a start into the wood. There was no doubt that sconer or later the case the same start into the ranch.
"Keep with me, Frank; you'd never find your way in the timber on your own," whispered Bob.
"You bet!" answered Frank.
"Come on!"
Bob Lawless led the way through the cedars and firs and larches, Frank keeping close hehind.
Frank Richards had, by now, a good deal of experience of the Canadian West; but he was not yet equal to finding his way through the forest by night, far from the regular track. But his Canadian cousin pressed on with hardly a halt.
In a short time the glade where they had been prisoners was left far his the trees thinned, and the larches grow more natch as they never the chind.

The trees thinned, and the larches rew more patchy as they neared the plain.

They stood at last on the edge of the timber, with the rolling plain before them, a half-mile or so from the spot where the regular trail ran from the timber to the plain.

trom the tumber to the plain.
The sun was quite gone now, and stars were sparkling in the sky.
Bob Lawless stared away anxiously in the direction of the ranch, far away out of sight across the rolling prairie.

away out of sight across the rolling praise. The was no cound in the soft creaming, save the sough of the wind in the branches around them.

But in the dimness a horseman might have been within twenty yards of them without being observed.

"I guess the rustlers are not far away, Frank," said Bob, in a whisper. "We might run into any of them any minute. We've got to keep low in the grass. Savvy?"

"You bet."
"You bet."
"Come on, then!"
Bob led the way again, and the schoolboys started at a run across the plain, bending their heads to keep them as much as possible on a level. The high grass.

"The light grass.
The word of the same and the schoolboys that the grass and their caution.

Bob suddenly grasped Frank by the arm, and dragged him down on lands and knees in the grass.

"What—" began Frank, in a startled whisper.

Bob's hand groped over his mouth and silenced him.

The 4th Chapter. The Attack On The Ranch !

The Attack On The Ranch!
Tramp!
Frank Richards lay silent, his heart beating painfully.
He heard the soft tramp of a horse's hoofs in the grass. He had not seen the rider, but evidently Bob Lawless had spotted him in time.
The trot was approaching the two schoolboys as they crouched in the thick grass.
This grass hid them as they lay; but hody of them were wondering schoolboys as they crouched in the thick grass.

This grass hid them as they lay; but both of them were wondering whether the rider had seen them ere they sank into it.

They were pretty certain that the rider was one of the gang of rustlers, though it was possible that he was a cowboy belonging to the ranch.

The hoof-beats came closer—closer—and stopped. They could hear the breathing of the horse only a few feet away in the high grass; they even caught a glimpse of a Stelson hat above. The horseman had halted only a few feet from them.

them. They crouched close, hardly speak.

They croucned the direction of the timber trail. A voice called:
"That you, cap'n,"
It was the rough voice of Buck

It was the rough voice of Buck Benson.
"Yes, Buck." The voice that replied was clearer, more cultivated, and evidently that of the chief of the gang of cattle-liters. "All O.K."
"Sure! Five galoots on the timber trail, all told, and they're reped in the timber new, cap'n, but the trail of the control of t

"Good! Bunco stopped three coming up from Silver Creek," said the captain. "The coast is clear enough now. I guess it's time to close in."
"No alarm at the ranch, cap'n?"
There was a seft chuckle.
"None. Nobody's got through. Our crowd hasn't been seen yet, except by one cowboy, who came riding from the ranch, going to Thompson. And he lies in the grass yonder, roped up and 'gaged. Rancher Lawless won't get word of Rancher Lawless won't get word of "How many at the ranch do you reckon, cap?"
"Not more than four or five at

"How many at the ranch do you reckon, cap?"

"Not more than four or five, at most, I reckon, They're away with the foreman up the range. There's a crowd of horses in the corral ready for us, and about thirty head of cows on the home range. But that isn't all. The ranch itself is our game. This isn't a poor homestead like the Lawrences' shebang. Rancker Lawless will have enough in his desk to pay us for our trouble, without his steers."

Buck Benson chuckled.
"It's a cinch, cap'n."

Buck Benson chuckled.

"It's a cinch, cay'n."

"Ride round and give the word to the boys to close in!"

"Sure!".

Buck Benson rode off, and the hoof-beats died away in the grass.

Frank and Bob did not stile-lifters,
The captain of the cattle-lifters,
The captain of the cattle-lifters,
and the cattle word of the colloquy between the two rascals.

A match scratched, and a scent of rascals.

A match scratched, and a scent of tobacco reached them. The captain had lighted a cigarette.

He sat his horse silently as he smoked it.

smoked it.

Bob elenched his hands hard. He could not move without betraying himself to the raider, but every moment was precious. The ranch-raiders were about to make their swoop, for which such careful and elaborate preparations had been made. Doubtless, Mr. Lawless had heard of the last night's raid on the Lawrence homestead; but it was very unlikely homestead; but it was very unlikely that he was prepared for this sudden homestead; but it was very unlikely that he was prepared for this sudden swoop upon his own ranch. It seemed like hours to the two boys before the horseman stirred at last. The stimp of the smoked eigarette was thrown away. It fell within an inch of Frank Richards' hands, as he crouched in the grass.

The captain pursed on, within a few feet of the schoolboys, out the grass and the darkness hid them.

They be the deeply, pastingly, grass and the derikness hid them.

They be the deeply pastingly, are grass and away.

"That was a narrow shave, Frank," whispered Bob, his voice shaking. "Come on! We're inside the ring now. Run for it!"

"I'm ready!" panted Frank.

Still keeping their heads low, they ran through the grass. In the thick, high grass, running, was not easy; but they pressed on, without a stop, their breath coming in laboured, gasps.

In spite of themselves, their pace gasps.

In spite of themselves, their pace slackened down: but they still ran on as fast as they could, and the ranch-house loomed up before them

As they had expected, everything presented its usual aspect. There was no alarm so far, no suspicion that a circle of desperate riders was that a circle of desperate riders was considered to the real process of the real process of the real process. The great process of the real process the contrades came parting up.

"Bob! Frank!" His voice was stem. "Why are you so late? I was getting alarmed about you—"
"Popper—" panted Bob.
"Where are your horses? What has happened?"

happened?"
"The raiders!"
"What?"

Published Every Monday

"They're coming, uncle!" gasped

Frank.

Mr. Lawless gave the two school-boys a quick, searching look. Then he said quietly:
"Tell me-sharp!"

Bob panted out a hurried explanation. The rancher listened, without a muscle quivering on his steady, bronzed face.
"How far away did you leave him—the captain, as you call-him!"
"About a mile."
"And you heard them say they were closing in?"
Yes."

"Yes."
The rancher knitted his brows.
"Very well! Go and warn your mother, Bob, and tell her not to be alarmed. Get the shutters barred over all the windows, and the doors closed and barred. Sharp!" "Yes, dad."

"Then get your rifles."
The chums ran into the ranch-house, their hearts thumping with excitement. They heard the rancher's voice calling as they went. It did not take Frank and Bob long to cary out the rancher's instructions. Mrs. Law-less received the news quietly, though her face became a little pale. Frank and Bob did not lose a moment; and when their work was done they came back to the big doorway.
Outside lay the velvety dimness of a

Dack to the big doorway.

Outside lay the velvety dimness of a fine September night, with stars in myriads twinkling in the sky overhead. From the deep distance came muffled sounds, the sounds of horses in the thick grass. Bob Lawless peered out into the shadows.

"Thav's coming till he breathed."

me time grass. Boo Lawless peered out into the shadows.
"They're coming;" he breathed.
Frank Richards grip was hard on his rile. He wondered, breathlessly, what the next few minutes were to bring. It was evidently his uncle's intention to defend the ranch if it were attacked, and from the talk between the "captain" and Buck Beason, the chums knew that it was not only the cattle that the raiders were after. The house itself was to be raided, startling, almost incredible as such an attack seemed, in law-abiding Canada. The sturyd figure abiding Canada. The sturdy figure of Rancher Lawless loomed up before them.

"If Billy Cook and the boys weren't up the range," he muttered, biting his lip. "But the rascals knew that, of course. They may drive the steers, but they won't rope in my herd of horses, I reckon. But we shall see."

Thud, thud!
"Get my rifle, Bob!"
"Here it is, father!"
"Good!"

"Good!"

The rancher examined the rifle quickly, and dropped the butt of it to the wooden step of the dootway, and stood waiting. Behind him the chums of Cedar Creek stood, breathless. A bunch of horsemen loomed less. A bunch of up in the gloom. "Halt!"

"Halt!"
It was the rancher's voice that rang out sharply.
He raised his rifle to his shoulder.
"Halt! Who are you, and what do you want?"
A laugh came echoing back.

"I guess we're visitors for you, Rancher Lawless. Friends to see you from over the border." It was the captain's voice. "If any man raises a hand, that man dies! My word on it!"

"Halt, or I shall shoot!"
"I guess it will be the last thing you'll do on this earth, if you pull trigger, rancher!"
The horsenen came on.

ne horsemen came on.

Crack!
With a steady hand the rancher fired into the thick of them, and a loud, terrible cry answered the shot.
The next instant the rancher stepped back quickly, and the great door slammed. It was only in time. There was a spattering of revolvershots, and the lead whizzed and rang on the door. With a steady hand the rancher jammed the thick wooden bars into Jones and the steady hand the rancher jammed the thick wooden bars into Jones and the steady hand the rancher jammed the thick wooden trampling of hoofs, and affect whouting of savage voices. Loud and heavy blows rained on the door.

The rancher coolly re-loaded his rifle. Mingled with the savage uproar without came the sound of deep groans. The man who had fallen was evidently hard hit.

"They know what to expect now," said the rancher grimly. "Steady, my boys! We can hold the ranch till help comes."

"The men, father—"
"The men, father—"
"There were only two of the men with me. I've sent one riding to Silver Creck. He may get through. The other's in the horse corral. The critters are to be stampeded. It's the only way to save them."
"Oh, good!" muttered Bob. Crash, crash!

Crash, crash!
Whipstocks were beating on the oor and the shuttered windows as door and the shuttered windows as the angry raiders ade savagely round the building. But the stout pinewood was impervious to such attacks. In the midst of the angry beating there came a sudden yell.

"The horses! It's a stampede!"

Like thunder came the sound of countiess galloping hoofs. From the ranch-house it could not be seen, but a rocket was flaring amongst the startled horses in the corral, and the corral gates were vide ofen. From each gate poured the frightened horses in a tertified, galloping mob that no man could have stopped. The voice of the capitain was heard, shout-ing curses, as he saw his prey escaping him.

voice of the captain was heard, shouting curses, as he saw his proy escaping him.

The rancher smiled grimly.

To round up the horses on the plains after a stampede was a long and difficult take for the cowboys. But it was better than letting a valuable-horse like the latting and the raiders. The cattle-lifters had no chance of stopping the wild stampede. The almost frantic horses, with widly-tossing manes, fled in all directions in the night, the cattle-lifters crowding out of their path, to avoid being carried away in the mob of scared animals.

Crash, crash;

A voice shouted outside, the voice of the captain:

"Rancher Lawless, I'll hang you over your own door for this!"

The rancher shrugged his shoulders.

"Axes here!" shouted the captain.

Crash, crash, crash! A quivering axe-head came through the wood, and left a gap as it was withdrawn. The rancher jammed the muzzle of his rifle to the slit, and fired. There was a fearful cry without, and the sound of a falling body.

The there was a wild trampling of retreating feet. And then came crash on crash of rifle-fire, and the buildes spattered like hall on the door.

(Another spicedial table of Frank Richards & 'Co., entitted: "The

(Another splendid tale of Frank Richards & 'Co., entitled: "The Schoolboy Hostage," in next Mon-day's Boys' Friend.)

Mexican Jo, with a grin on his swarthy face, looped a rope round the wrists of the two schoolboys. There could be no resistance against a levelled rifle in the hands of Buck Benson! A HOLD-UP!

THE SCOUTS' POW-WOW CORNER.

By "Scoutmaster."

The trained scout who wishes to scan a certain piece of open country from behind a cluster of rocks will crawl to them on all fours, or wriggle his way, smake-like, on his stomach, making very slow progress. He will-then lie full length on the grass and very slowly raiso his heed a fraction of an inch at a time till he can see the view. It may take him a quarter of an hour or longer before he has raised his head sufficiently above the rock to see the view he is after, but a scout soon learns that patience is not only a virtue, but is a weapon without which no scout can take the field. The trained scout who wishes to field.

Having gained the position he requires to study the open country, the scout remains perfectly still, and should he see an enomy before him, he will not move until he is assured that his head has been mistaken for a part of the rock. That is where the scout's training is essential. The tenderfoot, on seeing the presence of danger, would quickly withdraw his head from view. The trained scout knows full well that any sudden movement would very likely attract attention, even at a consider-able distance. Thus he appreciates the value of being able to keep priority still. the value rigidly still.

rigidly still.

I attach great importance to the art of finding cover, and there is no better way of learning this than by studying Nature's scouts—the beasts of the field and the birds of the air.

I have inpuressed upon you how essential it is to keep "down wind." of any beast you wish to stalk, but there are many other essential points to note, the chief being that you must gain a fairly accurate knowledge about animals and their habits.

must gain a fairly accurate knowledge about animals and their habits.

To all who would learn the true scouting art there is no better practice possible than stalking animals and birds, and as you improve at the game it abounds with interest. You will be able to study the animals, you will get to like them, and the more you will realise the wonderful work and given them for self-protection. By this I do not necessarily mean their teeth or claws or horns. I mean, rather, their fully developed sense of smell, sight, instinct, and quickness of hearing.

Remember in your stalking you are out to learn, and not to kill. There is no enjoyment in killing for killing's sake. The Chief Scout considers hunting, or going after big game, is one of the finest things in scouting. But he lays particular stress that he does not refer to the "kill" in the adventurous life in the jungle, but to the other advantageous and equally exciting part of the hunt. The actual shooting the animal in big game hunting is the very smallest part of the fun. The fun lies in the chances of the animal hunting you instead of you hunting the animal, the interest in tracking him up, stalking him, watching all he does and learning his habits.

No soout should ever kill an animal unless there is some very justifiable cause, and then he should do to quakify and effectively, so as to grow the should be an expected by going out fully-armed, your weapon being your camera. The stalker's badge is one of the best water, or even how a wild rabbit-builds its nest and obtains food for its family?

Just as much satisfaction can be obtained by practising your stalking on the home fields and woods as in the wildest parts of Africa.

He is just as difficult to stalk a rabbit or weasel or stoat as it is to stalk a lion. By careful study you can learn unech about tame animals, and the habits of wild animals at home are much the same as the habits of the wild animals of the jungle.

There is no more attractive positions.

In the weak the control of the wall and the control of the wall as the does and then he should not quickly and effectively, so as to give it as little pain as possible.

Much greater fun can be obtained by going out fully-armed, your weapon being your camera. The staker's badgo is one of the best you can gain. It supplies upon the gain of the staker's badgo is one of the best you can gain. It supplies upon the gain of the staker's badgo is one of the best you can gain. It supplies upon the gain of the staker's badgo is one of the best you can gain. It supplies upon the staker's badgo is one of the best you can gain. It supplies upon the staker's badgo is one of the best you have gained.

Mowever, it is not the average secout's opportunity to journey out into the wilds of Africa to practise his stalking; and perhaps it is just as well, until a little proficiency has been obtained. But practically as much practice can be done by studying all wild animals and tame animals at home.

A totat will get upon the second of a rabbit, and though the chase may last for hours, whilst there is an atom of strength in his body he will not glast oward, knowing full well that especially as more appropriately and the profice of the mental and the profit of the wild animals of the part of the animal world. There is no more attractive passime than to get away from everybedy and the than toget away from everybedy in the than toget away from everybedy and the than than toget away from everybedy and the than toget away from everybedy and

Here is another striking lesson to the scoul, another point he must attend to to gain proficiency as a scout. A boy can be-chased by another, and it matters little if he is caught. A hunted animal must be able to go "all out" all the time. He knows full well that once his captor is upon him no possible chance of escape awaits him.

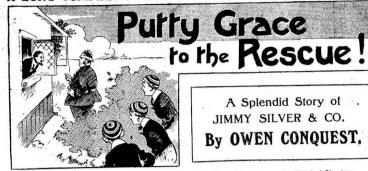

possible chance of escape awaits him. There is no wild animal that need fear no foes. Their nuwriten motto is "Be prepared." Nature has provided the property of the prepared of the prepared hungry and baffled. Hedgehogs are natural enemies of all reptiles, and particularly the viper. Cases have been reported of how a hedgehog, finding a viper asleep in the sun, has scired its tail between its teeth and rolled into a ball. The viper cannot escape, and eventually the hedgehog breaks his fast, and again rolls himself up, to sleep the sleep of the overfed.

(Another splendid Scout article next Monday.)

A LONG COMPLETE TALE OF THE CHUMS OF ROOKWOOD!

Published Every Monda

A Splendid Story of ... JIMMY SILVER & CO. By OWEN CONQUEST.

The 1st Chapter.

A Licking for Three!

Putty of the Fourth put his head imo the end study. There was a very sympathetic ex-pression on his face. It was easy to see that Putty was the bearer of ill tidings.

"You fellows are wanted!" he said. You fellows are wanted!" he said. Jimmy Silver grunted. Raby and Newcome looked worried. They had been expecting the summons, but that did not make it any the more welcome did not make it any the more welcome when it came.

"The Head" asked Jimmy.

"Now for it!" murmured Raby, rubbing this hands in dismal anticipation. "It was bound to come."

"Jimmy's stunts generally lead to something of the kind!" remarked Newcome morosely.

"Rats!" was Jimmy Silver's rejoinder to that.

"You saw the Head, Putty?" asked Raby.

Raby.
"Yes. He called to me and sent me for you."
"Did he look waxy?"

"Did he look waxy?"
Putty grinned.
"A trille!" he answered.
"A trille!" he answered.
"Anybody with him?"
'Yes, Mr. Lasker, the tenant of Heath Bungalow."
"I knew it!" growled Raby. "The Beak will lay it on this time! Well, let's go and get it over!"
"I suppose you fellows have been ragging that bounder at the bungalow again?" asked Putty curiously.
'Yes, in a way."

"Yes, in a way."
"What a pity you didn't ask manage it for you!" reman

"What a pity you didn't ask me to manage it for you?" remarked Putty reflectively, "Then this wouldn't have happened."
"Fathead!" was Jinmy Silver's ungrateful reply. "Come on, you follows! We've got to go through it."
Jimmy Silver led the way from the end study, and his chums followed him with lugubrious faces.
Their steps were slow and reluctant as they repaired to Dr. Chisholm's study. It was an apartment the juniors never cared for visiting, and the present occasion was likely to be a very painful one.
Outside the Head's door the three

be a very painful one.
Outside the Head's door the three juniors paused. juniors paused.

"I—I suppose it's no good explaining to the Head," murmured Raby, "about—about Lasker, and what we suspect.——"

"Fat lot of good!" grunted New-come. "Do you think the Head would listen to such a yarn for a

"But it's true, you know."
"The Head wouldn't listen, all the same. Besides, we've got no proof, have we?"

same.

"What do you think, Jimmy? I what do you tains, Jimmy? I don't want a thundering good licking if it can be helped."

Jimmy Silver shook his head de-

Jimmy Silver shook his head decidedly,
"We're not going to put the rascal on his guard, by saying what we suspect," he answered, in a low voice.
"We knew we were risking a licking, and now it's come we've got to stand it. Come on!" at the Head's. and it. Come on!"
He tapped resolutely at the Head's door.

"Come in!"
Dr. Chisholr
and ominous. olm's voice was very deep

The three juniors entered. The Head was standing

The Head was standing by his writing-table, his brow very stern. Mr. Lasker was seated.

The latter gentleman glanced at the juniors, and his eyes glittered. He was dressed in black, as usual, and his swarthy face was lowering and threatoning. His dyed hair glimmered in the sunlight from the window.

"Are these the transfer of the standard of the sunlight from the window.

"Are these the boys, Mr. Lasker?"

asked the Head of Rookwood, in a cold, formal manner asked the Head of Rookwood, in a cold, formal manner. "They are the boys!" answered the tenant of the bungalow.

tenant of the bungalow.
"Very good! Silver, Raby, Newcome." said the Head, bending a stern lance upon the hapless trio, "Mr.
Lasker informs me that yesterday afternoon you visited his bungalow on Coombe Heath..."
"You is "

murmured Jimmy "Yes, sir," Silver meekly.

"Yes, sir," murinitied of sharp silver neekly.

"That part of the heath has been placed out of bounds, owing to the trouble that has already occurred between Mr. Lasker and No. Wood have been guity of dark of the new personally in good the here at all."

The jumps the fact, and it was impossible to explain to the Head by what mental processes of their own they justified their action to themselves."

they justified their actions solves.

"Mr. Lasker states that you seized him at his own gate, threw him down, and thrust a wet sponge into his face!" said the Head.
No answer.
The juniors looked, as they felt, dismal. Stated thus by the Head, their escapade did seem, even to themselves, a dreadfully serious affair.
"Are you aware," containly if he es, a dreadfully serious affair.

Are you aware," continued the ad, "that Mr. Lasker could, if he se, prosecute you for assault and tery?"

C-c-could he, sir?" stammered Raby.
"He could!"

"He could!"
"Oh, sir!" murnured Newcone.
"I hardly know how to deal with such a case of flagrant delinquency," said the Head. "I need not say that your punishment will be severe. You must realise that."
The juniors' looks showed that they did

did. "I shall cane you with the utmost

"I shall cane you with the utmost severity."
"Oh!"
In Mr. Lasker's presence. And I shall give my word to Mr. Lasker that, in the event of any repetition of your conduct, a public flogging shall be administered in the presence of the old, sir!"
"Does that salisfy you, Mr. Lasker?" asked the Head, turning to the gentleman in black with cold,

"Oh, sit" asisty you, Mr.
Lasker" asked the Head, turning to the gentleman in black with cold, format courtees.
"Quite!" he answered.
"Very good! I shall now cane you in Mr. Lasker's presence. You first, Silver."
Jimmy Silver stepped forward.
What followed was very painful.
Mr. Lasker looked on as if he enjoyed the scene, as probably he did. The unfortunate heroes of the Fourth were very far from enjoying it.

unfortunate heroes of the Fourth were very far from enjoying it. The Head, when he let himself go, was an expert with the cane. He laid it on with scientific precision. Jimmy Silver & Co. had been caned before, but they had never been through such a licking as this. When it was over the Head was breathing rather hard, and the three juniors were quite pale.

juniors were quite pale.

Dr. Chisholm made a gesture

Dr. Chisholm made a gesture towards the down of the said curdly.

The three fourth-Formers limped out of the study.

They did not speak in the passage.

They were past words. They only limped away painfully to their own quarters, where they sat down and looked at one another.

Jimmy Silver was the first to break the anguished silence.

"It's for old Lovell's sake!" he muttered.

The for our Loven's sase: he indetered.

Raby and Newcome did not answer.
They were suffering too much just then, even to give a thought to their absent chum—Arthur Edward Lovell.

The 2nd Chapter. Lovell Wants to Know!

"Get out!"

Jimmy Silver spoke in quite a feeble tone as Tubby Muffin put his fat face into view in the doorway.

"Lesy Jimmy—"

imus, face into view in the face into view i indignantly. "Nice way to treat a fellow who's doing you a favour, I must say. If you don't want to answer the telephone, Jimmy." "The telephone?" repeated Jimmy Silver. "Lovell's ll's rung you up on Mr. telephone. Bootles sent me

"Oh, I see!"
"And if you

"And if you can't even thank a chap for coming upstairs to bring you a message—" said Tubby warmly. "Scat!"

"Scat."

Jimmy Silver rose painfully. It was half an hour since the licking in the Head's study, but the pam was far from wearing off yet. Still, Jimmy was feeling a little better; and, certainly, if his absent chum was on the telephone, Jimmy wanted to speak to him.

He went downstairs to Mr. Bootles' study.

The Fourth Form master greeted him with a kind smile. Mr. Bootles was well aware how Arthur Edward Loyell was missed by his old chums, and he had more than once shown his sympathy in a kind, quiet way. "Lovell has rung me up, and asked permission to speak to you, Silver," he said. "It is—ahem l—rather unusual; but you may speak to your friend on my instrument. As it is a trunk call, you had better lose no time." The Fourth Form master greeted im with a kind smile. Mr. Bootles

"Thank you, sir!" said Jimmy gratefully, Mr. Bootles waved his hand towards the telephone, and left the study. Jimmy picked up the receiver. "Hallo!"

"Hallo!"
"Hallo! Is that you, Jimmy!"
Is was the well-known voice of Arthur Edward Lovel, formerly of the Rookwood Fourth, that came over the wires—faint in the distance, but easily recognisable.
"Yes, old chap," said Jimmy. "Tm jolly glad to get a word with you!"

"Yes, old chap," said Jimmy.
"Yes old chap," said Jimmy.
"I'm jolly glad to get a word with you!"
"It's rather a cheek, ringing you up on Bootles' 'phone," said Lovell;
"but I thought he'd let us have a jaw. He's a good old cort. It's rather important, too. You asked mo to send you aphotogs cold with the pator's money. I had to ask father for it, and he's jolly interested. The police believe now that Pilkingham is still in England, and the pater thinks you may have seen something of him, from your asking for the photograph.
Is there any news, Jimmy?
"1-I hope so, Lovell."
"You haven't seen him?"
"Ye got a suspicion."
"Yhe got a suspicion."
"Yhe soet a suspicion."
"Yhe soet a suspicion."
"I'we hope and the certain, but ging to make sure. I'm glad you called me up, Lovell. I was going to write to you, and this will save time.
We've not said anything about your affairs here, of course. Nobody knows why you left. But I think Putty nright be able to help us in this business-Grace of the Feurth, you know.
Would you mind if we told him?"
"No objection that I know of,
said Lovell. "He's not a chap to him?"

No objection that I know of," Lovell. "He's not a chap to
e. But I'll ask the pater—he's said Lo

Lovell's voice came through again at last.

"You there, Jimmy!"
"Yes."
"You as tell Putty, if you like—not to go any farther, of course. The pater is anxious that my young brother shouldn't be worried by knowing how we stand. You catch on!"
"I understand, old fellow!"
"How is my minor going on now?"
"Right as rain."
"Good! But do you really think,
Jimmy, that you've seen some chap

Right as rain."

"Good! But do you really think,

"Jimmy, that you've seen some chap
who may be that rascal Pilkingham, and that there's a chance of spotting
him?

him? "I really think there's a chance, Lovell, and if I find anything out for certain I'll send you a wire." "Good for you! We're awfully anxious, of course. If that villain was found, and the money recovered, I could come back to Rookwood. Wouldn't that be prime?" could come back to Wouldn't that be prime?" "What-ho, old fellow!" "Hallo, time's up!

Good-bye Jimmy!

Jimmy "Jimmy Silver put up the receiver and loft Mr. Bootles' study.
Raby and Newcome looked at him as he came back into the end study in the Fourth, with languid interest.
"Anything freah from Lovell's sketd Raby.
"No; only he's rather excited about our idea that we've seen that absconding solicitor chap. And we can tell Putty—" Putty—"
"What do you want to tell him

"What do you want to ten ma-for?" I think he may be able to help us out. He's awfully keen, you know. And—and 'I'm blessed if I know exactly how to nail that villain Lasker down, even if he is Pilkingham, confessed Jimmy Silver. "I'd like to talk it over with Putty, and see what he thinks. Not just yet though. We'll wait for this to wear off. Jimmy rubbed his hands. "It's get-ting a bit better now, but—" "Ow, ow."

ting a bit better now, but—"
"Ow, ow!"
"Ow, ow!"
"If we're able to get old Lovelt back to Rookwood, we shu'n't mind this licking much," said Jimmy.
"Not when it's worn off! Ow!"
But the licking was a long time wearing off, and for most of that evening Jimmy Silver & Co, were in a very unhappy state, and, in the end study little was heard but painful mumblings.

The 3rd Chapter. Putty Agrees !

Adsum, dear boy," said Putty,

"Adaum, dear boy," said Putty, with a smile.
"Come along to Little Quad," said Jimny Silver. "I want you to lend us your chin in a pow-wow."
"Delighted, old chap! If you're thinking of going for that cad Lasker again, count me in," said Putty Grace at once, "I'm your man!"
Morning lessons were over, and Jimmy had hailed Grace as the Fourth came out of their Form-room. The Co. walked across the quad with Putty, and they went through the archway into Little Quad, where they were in quiet seclusion on one of the archivay into Little Quad, where they were in quiet sectosion on one of the old oaken benches under a beech-tree. Jimmy were been to be considered to be considered to the constant of the control of the constant of the cons grave fa about it

awas. acus. 1 ou re Johy serious about it?"

"Nothing like a thumpin' licking to make a fellow serious," remarked Raby. "The Head's promised us a flogging in Hall if we go for that rotter, Lasker, again."

Putty Grace whistled.

"Then I'd let him alone." he said.
"Leave him to .me. I'll take the matter off your hands."
"It isn't only a rag," said Jimmy.
"It's about Lovel!—"
"Lovel! What's Lovell got to do with Lasker?"
"A Jot, I hope!"

"A lot, I hope!"
"Blessed if I catch on!"

"A lot, I hope!"
"Blessed if Leath on!" said Putty.
"Suppose you enlighten me? If there's anything I can do for old Lovell, you've only to mention it, of ourse. I'm sorry he's loft."
"If things go as I hope, he can come back again," said Jimmy Silver.
"We're telling you a bit of a socret.
Putty; it's to go no farther. Lovell left because his father's ruined, and couldn't stand his fees here."
"My hat! Poor old Lovell"
"It's a rotten story," said Jimmy.
"Mr. Lovell's solicitor, a man named Pilkingham, got all his securities into his hands, and bolted. He robbed
Mr. Lovell and several other clients.
Only Mr. Lovell suffered most—he was nearly cleared out. It was sup-posed that Pilkingham had got out of the country with his loot; but the police have traced some bonds he got rid of, and that's taken as proof that he's still in England."

"In hiding somewhere, you know," said Newcome.
"And we think Lasker, at the lum-galow, is the man!" added Raby, Putty imped."

Putty jumped.

"Phew! I-I say, aren't he a

"Phw! I—I say, aren't you romancing a bit?" he asked. Letting your merry fancy run away with you, you know?"
"We're a fraid the police might think so, if we went to them," said Jimmy Sliver ruefully. "But we're proof, of course, we've got some eridene to go of only interested now, "Let's hear the evidence," he said. "I'll be umpire."

"Let's hear the evidence, he said."
"I'll be umpire."
"Lasker was here one day when Mr. Lovell called and it struck us that he was dodging Mr. Lovell sec-

"H'm!"

"Pilkingham is a little, greyheaded, grey-bearded man — and Lasker has his hair and whiskers dyed,
A dozen fellows have spotted that.
"Lots of people dye their whiskers."

"I know. But Pilkingham is a pale-looking blighter, and Lasker has a dark, foreign-looking complexion.
You've seen him—"
"Well, that's jolly unlike—"
""
"It's a disguise. Ha's got his skin stained dark," explained Jimmy Silver.

Silver.

"How do you know?"

"Because we've put it to the test," said Jimmy triumphandy.

"That's what the Head caned us for. We jumped on Lasker at his place to dab his chivry with a wet sponge, to see whether his complexion was real. And some of it came off on

"So, you see—"
"You're sure about that?" asked Putty.

Putty.

"Quite sure."

"L'is a fact." said Raby. "We got a thumping licking for doing it, but we did it.

some more evidence."

said Jimmy Suber. "You know said Jimmy Suber. "You know the best treassed in the bungalow on a smoking search thinking it was untreasted. It had it from Smythe that he saw whole bundles of War Bonds on the table there..."

"Them."

absconding Mr. Pikingham, in disguise and in hiding. They hadn't a doubt on the point.

But they realised that what to themselves looked like convincing ovidence, might appear to a disinterested party as trifles light as air.

Putty was a clever fellow, as all Rookwood knew, and they were glad to have his unbiassed judgment on the case. Only they hoped that his judgment would be in accordance with their own opinion. If it wasn't, it was quite probable that they would not attach very much importance to it.

it.
Putty of the Fourth was silent for some time, evidently thinking the matter out over carofully. The chuns waited for him to speak.
"You've told me all you knew?" he asked at last.

Maby.

Jimmy Silver took a photograph from his pocket.

"It's Pilkinghan," he said. "I've inked the whiskers black and that makes it look just like Lasker."

Putty studied the photograph care fully.

Excepting for the pale complexion, it certainly was very like Mr. Lasker of the bungalow, now that the hirsute adornments were blackened.

"Anything more?" asked Putty.
Jimmy Silver & Co. ran the matter over in their minds, adding every detail they could think of. Putty listened with the gravity and attention of a judge.

listoned with the gravity and accen-tion of a judge. "It looks jolly likely," he said at last. "It may be all moonshine— very likely it is—but any friend of Lovell is bound to look into it and see is there's anything in it. "You think there is?" asked Jimmy.

Jimmy.
"Yes, I do."
"Oh, good!" said the three together. And their respect for Teddy Grace's sagacity was increased on the Spot.

Evidently Putty of the Fourth was a fellow whose opinion was worth

"But I don't think it would be "But I don't think it would be much good going to the police-station with this yaru," added Putty. "It sounds—if you don't mind my saying so—a bit moonshiny. All the evidence hangs together, but it will be necessary to get something a bit more tangible. Every separate bit of the evidence might be explained away."

away."
"But, taken all together, it's—what d'ye call it—cumulative?" said Jimmy Silver.

silver.
"That's so. But you want some-thing clearer—something solid enough for a court of law, before you worry the bobbies on the subject," said Putty. "In fact, you've got to know, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the man is Pilkingham. But that can be done." "We re going to do it, somebow." "We re going to do it, somebow."

the man is Pilkingham. But that can be doncroing to do it, somehow, "said Raby." "Why, if the man's Pilkingham, he's got Lovell's pater's money there in the bungalow, and it could be found, and old Lovell could come back to Rookwood."

Putty nodded.

"We've got to know the facts," he said. "Trm going into it with you fellows, of course. I'd give a term's pocket-money to see old Lovell set right again, though I've had some rows with him. Have you fellows got an idea for showing the man up?"

"Not beyond what we've done already," confessed Jimmy Silver. "We've got proof enough to satisfy ourselves—but satisfying the him of course. And if anything was not without actually collaring him, of course, he would bolt, and we should be dished. It won't do to call out the police till it's a case of hand-nuizle."

"We've got to establish his ou the police till it's a case of handcuffs for the rotter, so that he can't mizzle."

"We've got to establish his identity," said Putty thoughtfully.
"How?"

"Ye've got to make him own up."

"How?"

"I've got a sort of a germ of an idea at the back of my head. I'll hink it out, styou's not thought of a sort inner an own of the county of
"I've got a sort of a germ of an idea at the back of my head. I'll hink it out, styou's not thought of an idea at the back of my head in
"I've got a sort of a germ of an idea at the back of my head. I'll hink it out, styou's not thought of
"All right, old chap!"

"As a matter of absolute fact, Jimmy Silver & Co. hadn't very much faith in Putty's powers of dealing with the tenant of the bungalow; they felt that the end study could rely upon itself for that. They had wanted his judicial opinion on the evidence; and that satisfied them. Du give Putty a the scheme, whatever it was, and they admitted the possibility that it might be a good one.

And when, after dinner, Putty of the Fourth whispered that he wanted to speak to them in their study, Jimmy Silver & Co. repaired to the end study to wait for him.

The 4th Chapter. Putty's Idea!

Jimmy Silver & Co. had waited ten minutes when Putty of the Fourth cume into the end study at last. Per-haps they were getting a little res-

Putty had a bag in his hand when he came in, and he closed the door after him carefully. The three chums looked at Putty and at his bag with curiosity, not unmingled with impatience. "What have you got there?" asked

Raby. "Theatrical props," answered

"My dear man, we're not thinking private theatricals now," said New-

"I am!" answered Putty.

Published Every Monda

come.
"I am!" answered Putty.
"Then you're an ass!"
Jimmy Silver gave an impatient shrug. Putty's devotion to theatricals was his ruling passion, and Jimmy Silver very readily admitted that forace of the Fourth was the best amateur actor he had ever seen; but he wasn't interested now in Putty's histrionic abilities. Even football, which was beginning now at Rookwood, occupied a very small share of Jimmy's thoughts. His attention was all given to the affair of Arthur Edward Lovell.

"I didn't know it was dashed theatricals you wanted to speak about,
Grace," said Jimmy,
"Another time, old chap!"
"Hold on! Look at this!"
Putty Grace opened the big bag,

Putty Grace opened the big bag, and, to the astonishment of the three juniors, turned out a policeman's tunic and trousers.
"What on earth's that?" asked "What on earth's that," asked Raby. "Bobby clobber, for our next comedy," explained Putty. "You re-member we're going to have a comic policeman, on the lines of Mr. Boggs of Coombe."

of Coombo."

"I remember, but I don't eare a rap," said Raby, "Can't bother about rot of that kind new."

"You don't catch on—"

"And we don't want to!" snapped Newcome, "For goodness sake give us a rest! Blow your silly theatricals!" cals

I haven't got the helmet yet,"
I Putty calmly. "But, as it's a said Putty calmly.

law and order in the room there with law and order in the room there with them.

"What on earth do you mean?" demanded Newcome testily.

Putty tapped himself on the breast.

"Liftle me!" he said Raby dazedly.

"You!" Development of Raby dazedly.

"Onlessonstable Putty!" said Grapoisesonstable Putty!" said Grapoisesonstable of Raby dazedly.

"With a thundering big pair of boots, and elevators in them, I shall be a good bit taller, and the helmet will add to the effect. In these clothes, well padded, I shall be nearly as fat as Boggs himself. As for my face, you know! can make it up with a new complexion and whiskers, so face, you know I can make h di who a new complexion and whiskers, so that the Head himself wouldn't know me. What?"

me. What?"
"You!" ejaculated Jimmy Silver.
Putty's astounding scheme almost took his breath away.
"You couldn't do it!" gasped

Raby.

Raby.:

Putty sniffed,

"I could do it on my head!" he said contemptiously, "There isn't the slightest doubt that Lasker will take me for a real policenian. I clap him on the shoulder, and arrest him as Pilkingham, Well, if he is Pilkingham, what will he do?"

"Try to bolk, I suppose."

"Exactly. And then we shall have the proof we want."

the proof we want."

"Yes. But if he isn't Pilkingham, after all—"

after all—"
"If he isn't, he'll have nothing to fear, and he'll tell me I've made a mistake, and report me at the police-station for bothering him," said Putty, with a grin. "That won't hurt me. Police-constable Putty will

There was a long and a deep discussion, and the chums of the Fourth quitted the end study, Putty carrying his bag. Mornington of the Fourth stopped Jimmy Silver in the lower

"About the football practice this ternoon—" he began.
"Bother the football!" said Jimmy. after "Bother the loousal."

"Eh?"
"I mean, we shall have to cut it,
I mean, we shall fave to cut it,
afternoon, will you?"
"Certainly! Something on?" asked

Morny.
"Yes; something rather important.

Ta-ta!"
And Jimmy Silver & Co. quitted Rookwood with high hopes, with which were mingled deep misgivings.

The 5th Chapter. In the Name of the Law!

"Ripping!"
It was a hearty exclamation of admiration from Jimmy Silver & Co. It was ripping, there was no doubt about that!

Three hours had passed since the Tourful-formers had left the school, and in those hours much had happing the school of the schoo poned.

Juny and Raby and Newcome had along charge of Putty's bag of 'sprogs' in the depths of Coombe Wood, while the sengegace of Rookwood had eyeled over to Rookkam, to be rare the secondhand helmet at a burdle on his biryele. He wheeled the machine into the wood, and joined the machine into the wood, and joined the trie, who were a little tired of waiting for him.

ARRESTING THE MAN IN BLACK! "You're my prisoner, Mr. Pilkingham!" said "Polite-constable" Putty Grace gruffly. "I think as You'flu clap the darbies on!" Olick! A grean escaped the raceal as the handcolfs closed arround his wrists.

half-holiday to-day, I can bike over to Rookham. I know where to get a secondhand one cheap. You fellows can stand part of the expense, and we'll put it down to the dramatic club, of course.

"Toon't open the door, Newcome. I haven't explained yet."

"I tell you we're not bothering about diotic theatricals now!" howled Newcome. "Talk about Nero fidding while Rome's burning! I think you're the outside edge of the limit fatheads."

"Let me explain, all the same We've got to make Lasker own up that he's Pilkingham—If he is Pilkingham.

ham

"One the point of talk sense."

"Oh, if you're going to talk sense." said Newcome, dropping his hand from the door-handle.
"I know it's not usual for chaps to talk sense in this study." said Putty sweetly. "But I'm going to chance it, and if I put it in words of one syllable, you fellows may catch on."
"Look here, you ass..."
"Come to the point, old fellow!" said Jimmy Silver.
"Suppose a policeman walked into the bungalow," said Putty quietly. "He dabs his hand on Lasker's shoulder, and says..."
"But!" said Raby. "We've."

"He dabs his hand on Lasker's shoulder, and says—"
"Rat!" said Raby. "We've agreed not to call in the bobbies till we've got clear proof—"
"Ass" said Putty politely. "The bobby I am thinking of is in this study at the present moment!"
"What?"
The abuse of the Very Merchant of the Property of the Very Merchant of the Very M

The chums of the Fourth glanced round the end study, as if half-expect-ing to see a blue-coated upholder of never show up at the station to be ragged by the inspector!"

Jimmy Silver laughed.

"It's a good stunt!" he said.

"But-but---"

"H's a good stunt!" he said.
"But—but—"
"Never mind buts," said Putty.
"I's against the law to put on a policeman's clobber, and make out to be a peeler," said Raby.
"But we're going to do it to help the law, fathead, and that makes all the difference!"
"Yes, if the man is Pilkingham. But if he isn't.—"
"If he isn't.—"
"If he isn't, we shall know for certain; and Police-constable Putty will vanish on the spot, and disappear out of existence, and no harm done."
"Well, that's so," agreed Raby thoughtfully.
Jimmy Silver nodded.

Jimmy Silver nodded.

"Blessed if we don't try it," he said. "It's risky; but we're ready to run risks for old Lovell's sake. We're run risks for old Lovell's sake. We re game!"

"Oh, we're game, if it comes to that!" said Raby, rubbing his hand-reminiscently, "But—"
"You're like a billy-goat, with your 'buts'!" remarked Putty, "Let's get to business, and leave butting till afterwards."

Jimmy Silver looked at his chums.
"It's risky!" he repeated. "But I think we ought to try it on, for old Lovell's sake! Let's settle the details, and wire in!"

and wire in!"
Raby and Newcome acquiesced, through with some misgivings. They had not yet forgotten their last visit to the Head's study and the caning administered in the presence of the obnoxious Mr. Lasker. But they acquiesced loyally.

Then the metamorphosis commenced

menced.

As a matter of fact, Putty's abilities in the making-up line had often been put to a severer test than this.

With his own clothes on, and some padding added, he filled out the old uniform very well, and made quite a nextly frue.

portly figure

unitorm very well, and made quite a portly figure.

A pair of huge and heavy boots, with elevators inside, made him almost tower over the other juniors. His face was given a rich and ruddy complexion from his make-up box, like P.-c. Boggs, of Coombe. And his whiskers looked more natural than Mr. Boggs own, the juniors declared. Jimmy Silver & Co. could hardly believe their eyes when they looked at Putty of the Fourth, after the transformation was completes beheld the transforming of their Form-fellow they certainly never would have dreamed that it was Teddy Grace who stood before them in the dasky that it was Teddy Grace who stood before them in the grace of the stood before them in the stood them the stood before them in the stood before them in the stood them the stood them the stood them the stood that the stood them the stood them the stood them the stood the stood that the stood them the stood them the stood them the stood that the stood them the stood them the stood that the stood them the stood the stood them the stood that the stood that the stood that the stood the stood them the stood that the stood that the stood the stood them the stood them the stood that the stood that the stood them the stood that the stood the stood them the stood them the stood that the stood them the stood that the stood that the stood the stood them the stood the stood them the stood them the stood them the stood them the

He might have been own brother to Mr. Boggs, of Coombe. Putty grinned, and clinked a rusty secondhand pair of handcuffs in his pocket. "Shall I do?" he inquired confidently.

Putty hadn't any doubt whatever that he would "do."

that he would "Ripping!"
"Topping!"
"First-rate!" "Trist-rate!"
"Then I'll get off!" yawned Putty.
"You fellows had better hang round the bungalow, at a safe distance, in case the rascal belts. For if he reall is Pilkingham, he will bolt righ is Pilkingham, he will bolt right enough!"

413-

"No doubt about that!" agreed Jimmy Silver. "But if he boltsæfe'll have him. We'll have the bike on the footpath ready, in case it's wanted. We'll be in cover, and watch you go in, and if you rell for us, we'll rush in and help. Even the Head won't rag us for being out of bounds, if we nail a man that's wanted by the police!"

police!"
"Well, I'm off!"
Putty walked away under the trees,
the chums watching him with great admiration.

admiration.
Police-constable Putty was imitating the stately troad of P.-c. Boggs, of Coombe, and the juniors could hardly believe it was not a real constable who was marching loftily towards the lane.
"Come on!" murmured Jimmy.
The three juniors followed at a safe distance, and the lane and

The three jumors ionioca assafe distance.
Putty emerged into the lane, and as he passed a group of village boys the Co. looked on breathlessly. This was the first test. But the villagers hardly glaunced at the sham policeman. Evidently they saw nothing suspicious in his aspect. Putty passed on with stately tread, taking heroes the open heath the footpath across the open heath, which led past the gate of the lonely bungalow.
"Prime!" murmured Raby.

"Prime!" murmured Raby.
Still keeping their distance, Jimmy wheeling the bike, the juniors followed Police-constable Putty.
The low roof of the bungalow was siable over the gores ahead. Putty of the Fourth marched on steadily towards it but his them followers. visible over the gorse ahead. Putty of the Fourth marched on stoadily towards it; but his three followers kept in cover of the lushes as they advanced. They did not want to be seen from the windows of the advanced. They are not seen from the windows of the bungalow.

Not far from the lonely building there was a fringe of willows by the footpath, and in cover of these trees Jimmy Silver & Co. stopped. It was as near as they could go without risking being observed.

Ahead of them, Police-constable Putty tramped steadily on to the garden gate.

Jimmy Silver felt his heart beating faster.

Jimmy Silver felt his heart beating faster.

The identity of the mysterious tenant of the bungalow was to be nut to the test, now. If he was Pilkingham, the absconding solicitor, the truth could hardly fast to the test had been as a criminal, in the other test was he his well as the man was a criminal, in the other than the was he his well as the most family of the most family that if he should be most family that if he should be most family that family of the most family of the most family of the most family that family of the most family

"Right-ho!" On all fours, the juniors crept out to the willows, their experience as by Scouts standing them in good

d now. ragged shrubberies in the nigalow garden effectually screened em from the house while they kept them from use the color of the color of the color of the dilapidated fence within which the shrubberies grew. They were only four of five yards now from Putty as he rtopped at the door of the bungalow. They remained on their knees out of sight, waiting, but listening intently. The four was in Jimmy's heart that Putty might arrying out the color of the co their knees out of sight, waiting, nit-listening intently. The fear was in Jimmy's heart that Putty might come to some harm, carrying out that extraorinary "stunt" but it was too late to change the programme now. Putty was already knocking at

now. Futty was arready knocking at the door.

A window opened.

Through a narrow opening in the shrubbery the juniors could see the front of the house. They saw the swarthy face of the man in black looking from the window beside the door. He was only four or five yards distant from them, and they could discern the startled look in his face though he was evidently trying to keep it under control. The knock and the sight of the official uniform had startled the mysterious tenant, and they believed that he was rather disconcerted.

"What do you want?" They heard clearly the rasping tones of the man in black.

Putty's reply did not sound as if there in the property of the man in black.

Putty's reply did not sound as if there in Putty's voice. He spoke in deep, gruff tones:

"This 'gre's Heath Bingalow, ain't.

deep, gruff tones:
"This 'cro's Heath Bungalow, ain't

"You're Mr. Lasker?"

"That is my name."

"Then I've got to see you, sir, if you'll be kind enough to open this ere door."

The man did not move from the

The mm did not move from the window.

What is wanted?" he asked.

If you'll bet me in, sir, I'll explain. It's 'ot standin' 'cre, sir, arter a long walk.

I'm you'll be me in, sir, I'll explain. It's 'ot standin' 'cre, sir, arter a long walk.

I'm a very busy man, officer.

Kindy explain your business to me at once!" snapped Mr. Lasker.

Putty mopped his forehead with his handkerchief, as if perspiring. It was quite a natural action, and it helped to screen his face from the keen eyes of the man in black.

"Can't you let me into the 'ouse, sir'?"

"Can't you let me have sir?"
"I have already refused to do so, unless you explain your business with me," said Mr. Lasker, sourly.
"I'm already sir, I must insist upon heutering. I'm ready to show you sutherity." "Tm atrau, beutering. Tin ready to sacmy authority."
"What do you meen?" panted Mr.
Lasker. "How dare you—"
"Nuff said! Will you open this
"Your said!"

"Nuff said! Will you do 'cre door?" 'cre door?"
"Certainly not!"
"You may as well open the door," said the pseudo constable, more gruffly than ever. "The game's up, Mr. Pilkingham, and you may as well take it quietly. It's my dooty to warn you that anything you say may be taken down to be used in evidence agin you."

be taken down to be used in evidence agin you.

The man in black clutched at the window-frame with feverish hands: it seemed, for a moment, that he was about to full back into the frame. His eyes almost started from his head as they were fixed wildly upon the figure at the door.

Raby nudged Jimmy Silver.

"He's the man! he whispered.

It was plain he whispered.

It was plain he whispered.

It was plain he whispered.

"He's the man! he whispered.

"He's the man! he whispered.

"He sale man he whispered.

"I was plain when he will have tent was not to be mistaken.

"Pikingham!"

"My name is Lasker—"

"I' you can prove that, sir, all the better for you!" was the gruff rejoinder. "I've got my dooty to do. Are you going to open this door? I slam!

"Slam! Slam!

Slam'
The window closed suddenly, and the blind dropped over it.
Putly drew a deep breath
It was clear enough now that Jimmy Silver's suspicion was well-founded—that the tenant of the bungalow was the missing solicitor. Was he going to open the door and surrender himself: It was pretty certain that he was hastily bundling tegether some of the more valuable plunder hidden in the bungalow to take to flight. Certainly, if he had been an innocent man he would have opened the front door.
Police-constable Putly struck a been an inincent man he would have opened the front door.

Police-constable Putty struck a leavy blow ou the door, which resounded through the flimsy building. Knock, knock, knock it. Hasty movements were heard within, but no footsteps approached the door. Jimmy Silver signed to his comrades, and they skirted round the fence to reach the rear of the building. Quite regardless now of the question of "bounds," the three juniors squeezed through the broken fence into the buck garden of the bungalow. They had no doubt whatever that the tenant was intending light from the back while the policeman was knocking at the front door. Putty continued to harmor at a door, the knocking of home of the ranged bushes in the back garden, Jimmy Silver & Co. waited breathlessly.

The kitchen door at the back of the bungalow opened with a made.

or the ragged bushes in the back garden. Jimmy Silver & Co. waited breathlessly.

The kitchen door at the back of the bungalow opened softly, and a scared face peered pryingly out.

The juniors did not stir.

It was the face of Mr. Lasker, alias Pilkingham, and the eyes were like those of a hunted animal.

He had a coat on now, and a soft hat crushed on his head, and a black bag gripped in his hand.

His hurried glance having shown him that there were no police at the back of the house, the wretched man came quickly out, leaving the back door open behind him.

Knock, knock, knock!

Putty hammered on. He had seen Jimmy Silver's manœuvre, and his object was to frighten the rascal out of the back of the house into the hands of the juniors.

In that he succeeded perfectly. The man in black came running down the back garden like a rabbit, panting, evidently with the desperate intention of making a break for the eyen heath.

He passed within a yard of the **ree* breathless juniors, and they leaped on him instantly, and bore him to the ground.

The bag flew from his hand as he crashed down on the weedy path, and a yell of terror left his lips.

"Got him?" yelled Ray.

Putly came speeding round the house, his truncheon in his hand now. The man in black was struggling width.

The man in wildly.
"You!" he panted, as he recognised Jimmy Silver among his assailants.

"Here he is, officer!" shouted

"Here he 1s, ounce."
Jimmy.
Putty arrived on the scene, and flourished his truncheon over the scared face of the rascal.
"You're my prisoner, Mr. Pilkingham?" he said gruffly. "Give me his 'ands, young gents, and I'll clap the ham!" he said gruffly. "Give me his 'ands, young gents, and I'll clap the darbies on!" Click!
There was a groan of despair from the rascal as the handcuffs fastened on his wrists.

The 6th Chapter. Righted at Last

Jimmy Silver & Co. released the man in black, and rose breathlessly to their feet. He sat up dazedly on the weedy path, panting. Police-constable Putty looked down at him grimly.

There was no further doubt now There was no further doubt now as to his identity. But although his actions had been unmistakable he had as yet admitted nothing. Police-consiable Putty's role was not finished yet. The last shadow of a doubt had to be cleared before the man was io be cleared before the man was taken into custody.

"Pick up that there bag, Master Silver!" said the pseudo constable, in his gruff tones. "There'll be evidence in that. Some of the plunder, I dessay, Git up, Mr. Pikingham!"

The man in black groaned.
"Send these boys away, officer!" he said faintly, "I want to speak to you privately."

"Send these noys away, oneer: ne said faintly. "I want to speak to you privately." "Stand back yonder, young gents." "Stand back yonder, young gents." "Stand back yonder, to see east of his making his escape. "Well, what awe you to say, Mr. Pilkingham? Tree warned you that anything you says may be took down in—"

"Let me go!" said the man in black, in a shrill whisper. "Officer, listen to me—"

"I've got to do my dooty."

"I'vell make you rich. A hundred pounds, a thousand pounds—" breathed the man in black." "Gaumon!"

pounds, a thousand pounds—breathed the man in black.

"Gammon!"
If have it in the bungalow. You shall see it, take it in your hands. Bank of England notes for a thousand, pounds for my freedom!" panted the man in black. "I ask only an hour's start. You can easily explain the delay to your inspector, and you will be rich. A thousand pounds in banknotes for my freedom."
Putty smiled.
"I spose there's plenty of evidence in that there bag to convict you, Mr. Plikingham!" he remarked.
"Yes, yes, What is the use of denial now!" ground the wretched swindler. "There are a hundred to recognish me as soon as I am in custody. A thousand pounds for my freedom."

freedom——"
"Dooty is dooty!"
"Dooty is dooty!"
"Five thousand pounds!" hissed Pilkingham. "I will place the money in your hands. Lead me back into the hungalow."

in your hands. Lead me back into the bagging and the bagging to the bagging the bagging the bagging and the bagging and the bagging and the bagging and the bagging the baggin officer."

What might have dawned upon him

What might have dawned upon him before but for his terror, dawned upon him now, and he began to understand that he had been tricked. He soon had proof of it. Putty, who found himself very warm in the uniform and padding, stripped them off now that they were needed no longer, and revealed himself in his very himself the proof of the himself very himself the proof of the himself very himself the himself very himself the himself very himself very

In swincer was satisfied and was satisfied every feet that stuff in the bag on the blke, Jimmy," said Putty cheerily. "I'm going to have a wash in the house, I've got before I'm the fourth grain before I'm seem in public, and the same was the property of the property of treasure dispelled any of Mr. Docks ingering doubts. And, although Mr. Boggs was doubtless above the temptations of bribery, Jimmy Silver & Co. walked with him and his prisoner to the station, and saw the rascal safely within that building before they left.

And then Jimmy fairly flew to the

"Pilkingham captured. Now in custody. Lots of loot recovered. Cheerio, old bean.—Jimmy Silver, Raby, Newcome."

That was the rather remarkable telegram despatched by the chuns of the Fourth. It made the young lady at the telegraph counter open her eyes, and it made Arthur Edward Lovell open his when it was delivered. And Jinnny Silver & Co. walked home to Rookwood in high feather.

Rookwood School rang with the story.

True, the successful juniors had

story.

True, the successful jupiors had been favoured by chance and luck, but the Rookwooders did not care about that. They had done it, and that was the chief thing. And certainly there was no doubt that they had done it. For it was done!

The Head fairly gasped when heard of it. But, strict disciplinarian as he was, he did not think of punishing Jimmy Silver & Co. for having gone "out of bounds" that eventful afternoon. Instead of that, he called them into his study a few days later, after a visit from the inspector of the police, and congratulated them warmly, chiding them a little, gently, at the same time. He shock hands with them when he dismissed them, and they departed, feeling very pleased with themselves and with the Head.

And Lovell, of course, came back. Almost the whole of Mr. Lovell's fortune was recovered among the booty

Almost the whole of Mr. Lovell's for-tune was recovered among the booty hidden in the lonely bungalow, as well as property belonging to others. Plikingham, before his flight, had made a clean sweep. Fortunately, after his capture, the police were able to make a fairly-clean sweep. And that change in the fortunes of the Lovell family naturally brought Arthur Edward back to his old school, and to the end study. Which was generally rejoiced in, only Tubby Muffin shaking his head rather serrorulily, as he gave up his rather sorrowfully, as he gave up his last hope of planting himself in that famous study in the place of Arthur

Edward. But Tubby forgave Arthur Edward But Tubby forgave Arthur Edward for coming back, and carried his for-giveness so far as to appear at the celebration which was given in the end study in honour of Arthur Edward Lovell's return, which all the Fourth Form agreed was an occasion to be marked with a white stone! And in the crowded study there were loud cheers, ster Arthur Edward Lovel proposed the health of Pelice-con-stable Putty. proposed the heards stable Putty.

THE END.

(Be sure you read next Monday's Rookwood story, entitled: "At Grips with the Sixth!")

(If you are in need of any advice concerning health and general fitness write to "The Manith Editor," The BOYS: FRIEND, The Fletiway House, Farring-don Street, London, E.C.4. All queries will be personally answered by Mr. Longhuret. Seize this opportunity of securing first-rate information and advice FRIEC!)

The Need for Sleep.

Working the muscles not only uses them up, but, if the work is hard and continued, it leaves behind in the muscles certain products sufficiently the blood of the manual that the muscles are the poisons; and it is because they are the poisons; and it is because they do stay behind in the muscles that the muscles become fatigued. Fatigue, you see, is a poisoning of the muscles. To get rid of some of these poisons takes quite a long time—many hours; anything from half a dozen to eighteen. Ultimately they are dissolved, and are carried away in the urine.

are dissolved, and are carried away in the urine.

This is the process which goes on while we sleep, and you can easily see why a decent allowance of sleep is a real necessity.

The more active and vigorous a life you lead, the more healthy you'll be, because vigorous movement is required to develop the museles and keep the organs in proper working order. On the other hand, this full exercise causes the production of much poison in the system, and more sleep is necessary in order to get that stuff out of the system.

Exercise at Night.

Exercise at Night.

Always, and to everybody, do I recommend the making a habit of doing a pit of light exercise just before a pool to be the property of the minutes:

and it won't take more than nimeteen minutes:

Ten deep breaths, either lying' flat on the back or erect, allowing stomach to come forward when inhaling, and squeezing stomach in when exhaling.

Twenty movements body bending forward, touching toes with fingers, or as near to them as you can.

Ten movements, lying on back and bringing straight legs above body, lowering legs until heels almost touch the floor.

the floor.

Five to ten movements, sitting up and bending forward from on the back position. If you can't keep heels on the floor while rising, get as heels on the floor while rising, get as near to doing so as possible.

Ten to twenty movements bending body at waist first to right then to left, one arm up in air, other along-side leg.

Five movements to right, five movements to left, the body above the hips only turning, arms sideways stretched and level with shoulders.

Ten brisk chest-expanding move-ments.

Ten brisk chest-expanding movements.

Ten "dipping" movements, body sinking until seat botches heels, body erect all the time.

Finish with twenty-five to fifty movements rising on toes as high as possible and sinking back until heels lightly touch floor.

Two deep breaths between each set of movements.

The blood will be drawn from the head, quickened up about the stomach, the liver stirred up, and you ought to sleep like a top.

Boyers' Muscle.

them where muscle is of the most use to them, and how to get it there.

Of course, a boxer ought to be pretty well developed all over, since there isn't a bit of him that doesn't do its share of the work required; but he particularly needs good muscle and pleatly of it in a few special parts of his anatomy. The chief of these parts are about the back of the shoulders and aeross the stomach. The first I'll call the hitting muscles; it he scoond he li be glad to have when an opponent treats him to a succession of helty body-blows.

The boxer doesn't not be werry about the development of the bicops. That is a pulling musc the extension the first him to a succession of the live of the steady of th the thrusting sums, straighten the arms foreibly and give quietness to the operation.

Shoving a heavy dumbbell above the head will develop the triceps muscles—those back of the upper arms—but it's not the ideal exercise for developing the right kind of

A Wrestling Problem.

A Wrestling Problem.
elastic muscle, not the variety that curls up into hard knots. He will get the right kind of muscle with free exercises, rapid punching at a sack, ball, or bag, and resistance exercises. A good express for the boxer is the arm extension movement I described some weeks ago for developing the shoulders and extending the reach. So is the exercise of standing with the hands on jambs of the doorway, letting the body come forward, and then pushing back to straighten arms. Sideways bending of the body, thrusting an arm down as the body is bent over, is a tip-top exercise for the big muscle running from the armpit to the ribs.

This last also develops waist-muscle, so useful to the boxer; while the ground exercises I have already described will develop the muscles proteing the stomach.

A Wrestling Problem

A Wrestling Problem.

Above is a drawing which contains a problem for those of my readers who are interested in Catchae-Catchae in the content of the conten is a most effective floid, one supplying a very powerful leverage upon the victim.

Now, my wrestling friends, buck up. Take a thorough good look ever the positions, and try to come to a conclusion as to whether any useful counter is open to the defender, and, if so, what it is, and how he should set to work to apply it. I have found the setting of such problems as the above of very great utility in developing interest in the sport Working out such problems lelps a wrestler to do a bot of thinking for himself. Put into a given position, on the mai, and it is posmost the most of the second of the posmost the second of the posmost that would at least the posmost that the position of the posmost the most of the posmost the posmost the posmost the posmost the posmost the proper to the position of the posmost the position again, well knowing what the result is noted by the position again, well knowing what the result is noted by the position again, well knowing what the result is noted by the position again, well knowing what the result is noted by the position again, well knowing what the result is noted by the position again, well knowing what the result is noted by the position again, well knowing what the result is noted by the position again, well knowing what the result is noted by the position again, well knowing what the result is not the position again. It isn't necessary for me to waste space in telling you about the value of boxing from the health and exercise point of iew. If you take up the game you know all about that; if you've no fancy for it, then it init to be shoved into you by my insisting that it's one of the best recreations going for developing your body and keeping you in good health.

For the moment I'm more concerned with lending a helping hand to those who are fend of a turn with the gloves to make themselves more efficient in the ring. I want to tell