A DISGRACE TO THE STUDY

A Magnificent New, Long, Complete School Tale of Tom Merry & Co.

CAUGHT IN THE ACT!

Copyright in the United States of America.

A DISGRACE TO . THE STUDY!

A Magnificent, New, Long, Complete School Story of Tom Merry & Co. at St. Jim's.

MARTIN CLIFFORD.

CHAPTER 1.

Glorious News! IGGY!" "Hallo!"
"I—I say, Figgy—" ratty Wynn seemed hesitate somewhat.

Figgins & Co.-Figgy, Kerr, and Wynn of the Fourth-were chatting in the porch of the New House at St. Jim's; or, to be more accurate, Figgins and Kerr were chatting, and Fatty Wynn was plunged in deep thought. Figgins and Kerr were discussing a recent House match, is, which the School House had been beaten—a very interest-ing topic. Figgins & Co. maintained that the New House was cock-house in cricket, as in everything else; but it could not be denied that Tom Merry & Co. kept the School House end up on the playing-fields; so the recent victory was a source of great satisfaction to the heroes of the New House.

Fatty Wynn appeared to be listening; but, as a matter of fact, his thoughts were far away. But he chimed in at

"Well?" said Figgins, as his plump and rosy chum hesitated. What is it, Fatty? Thinking of the next House match?"

"Eh?" said Fatty Wynn yaguely. "How long do you think it is likely to Figgy that depends," said Figgins, by the question. "I suppose "Well, that depends," surprised by the question. it depends on the length of the innings.

If you bowl as you did last time—"

How can the war depend on the length of an innings?" asked Fatty Wyon, surprised in his turn.

The war?" "Yes. I asked how long you thought it would last. "Fathead! I was talking about House bother the House matches!" said on, nother the House matches!" said Fatty Wynn. "Hov long do you think the war will last, Figgy?" "Blessed if I know!" said Figgy. "It's sure to be over before the year 2,000, I should say. You never can rall!"

"Oh, don't be an ass. you know! What do you think, Kerr?"

Kerr assumed a very serious expression. "We shall not sheathe the sword, which we have not lightly drawn, until the Prussian military domination is wholly and finally destroyed," he replied, in the celebrated words of a great statesman. "Oh, don't be funny!" said Fatty Wynn crossly.

"But that isn't funny," said Kerr.

"At least, it wasn't intended to be:"

"At least, it wasn't intended to be:"

"Look here, how long is it going on?" id Fatty Wynn. "I'm as patriotic as Look nere, now any is a garage of the said Fatty Wynn. "I'm as patriotic as anybody. I've put haif my pocket-money in War Savings Certificates. I've punched Clampe's nose for saying it's a case of six of one and half a dozen of the other. I ducked Racke's head in the fountain because his father makes warprofits. I've sworn a solemn swear never to buy anything German as long as live! But—but"But I do want a study spread again:" said Fatty Wynn pathetically.

said Fatty Wynn pathetically.

"Ha, ha, ha!"

"Tain't a laughing matter," said the fat Fourth-Former reproachfully. "I'm not a greedy chap, like Trimble over the way. But just think of it! A real study spread—lots of grub—no end of tuck—just think of it!" groaned Fatty Wynn.

"What's the good of thinking of it!" said Figgins, with a chuckle. "It's said Figgins, with a chuckle. "It's something to have enough to cat. The something to have enough to eat. Huns don't get that. I've read some-where that school kids in Hunland are taking to gnawing shoe-leather and things!"

Fatty Wynn shuddered. Kerr shook a severe finger at the fat

"You're weakening, Fatty! If you keep on like this, we shall have you howling for peace, like Trimble of the School House. It's up to the New House to keep a stiff upper lip, and see it through. We've got to beat the Huns by trightening our belts!

"I'd rather beat them some other way!" numbled Fatty Wynn, "There must be lots of other ways of beating

"Do you want to give in?" demanded Figgins ferociously. "Do you want Hun soldiers prancing down Rylcombe Lane? Do you want a blinking fat German professor stuck here as Head of St.

"Of course I don't, you assolaimed Fatty Wynn indignantly. you ass!" ex-

"What do you want, then?"
"I—I want a study spread." Figgins and Kerr grinned. Fatty Wynn had not turned a hair when the Zeppelins came over St. Jim's. He had only growled at Figgins for waking him up for so trivial a cause. If Fatty had been old enough to be in the trenches, he would have gone over the top as cheerily as the cheeriest Tommy in Flanders. But the grub rules hit him hard. Not that Fatty Wynn was greedy. As he that Fatty Wynn was greedy. As he often explained, he wasn't greedy, but he liked a lot. He really didn't care much about food, so long as it was good and there was plenty of it. And the Food Controller, though a very necessary official, appeared somewhat like an ogre to Fatty Wynn.

He would never have dreamed of dis regarding the food regulations, mind wandered back incessantly to the fleshpots of Egypt.

Once upon a time it was only a ques-tion of being in or out of funds. When a fellow was in funds he could give an order to Dame Taggles for a magnificent Fatty Wynn often dreamed of the pies of other days—the whacking pies of the dear, dead days beyond recall.

And he couldn't see anything to grin The situation was tragic-from his

at. The situation was tragic—from his point of view, at least.

"It won't do." said Kerr, shaking his finger at Fatty again. "You're weakening, Fatty. At this rate we shall soon have you joining the stop-the-war party. We shall have you turning into an unconscionable objector!"

"You ass!"

"And think what a disgrace that would be to the New House! Why, even Clampe, who's a smoky worm, says we've got to fight it out to a finish!"

Well, Clampe thinks it will be over before he's old enough to go. He says

"That's got nothing to do with it, fat-

"That's got morning."
"It may have in Clampe's case!"
grinned Figgins. "It won't do, Fatty!
The New House at St. Jim's stands solidly behind the boys at the Front, backing them up. You mustn't let your nind wander to study spreads. Tighten your belt, and grin and bear it, and thank your stars you weren't born a Hun. And I'll tell you what we'll do, Fatty whenever you show a sign of thinking too much about the grub, we'll bump you!" "Look here-

"As a friendly warning, you know. Otherwise, you may degenerate into a pacifist. Collar him!"
"Look here, you duffers—" roared Fatty Wynn wrathfully. "Leggo!

Bump!

Fatty Wynn sat down on the top step, planted there forcibly by his affectionate chums.

He gasped as be sat.

"Groogh! You silly chumps! Yah! Yow, you asses! Oh, my hat!" "Still thinking about study spreads?" asked Figgins.

Yes. "Give him another!" "Look here, I'll-I'll- I say-

Bump!

Bunnp:
"Oh, crumbs!"
Fatty Wynn struggled up breathlessly.
Ind doubled his fat fists. Figgins and doubled his fat fists. Fatty Wynn struggled up breathlessly, and doubled his fat fists. Figgins and Kerr backed away, grinning, into the quad. They backed into Mr. Blagg, the postman, who was coming to the New

"Huh!" grunted Mr. Blagg.
"Hallo, old Blaggy!" said Figgins.

"Hallo, old Diaggy Anything for us?"
"For Master Wynn!" said Mr. Blagg.
Fatty Wynn's wrath faded away at nec. If it was a remittance, there were once. If it was a reinteance, there were still edible things upon which the eagle eye of the Food Controller had not fallen.

"Hand it over!" he said eagerly. . "Is registered?"

it registered?"
"It's a posteard, Master Wynn!"
"Oh!" said Fatty, disappointed.
Mr. Blagg handed out the posteard, and went on his way. Fatty Wynn planced carelessly at the eard. It was addressed to him in an unfamiliar hand.

But as he turned it over and looked at the message written on the back, his expression changed, for the written message

"My dear boy,-I am aware that you must find the food restrictions somewhat irksome, and, therefore, I am sending you, per carrier, a hamper. I hope you will enjoy it.

"Your affectionate,

"UNCLE TOM."

CHAPTER 2. A House Row !

Al Jove! You look vewy pleased, deah boy!"

Arthur Augustus D'Arcy, of the Fourth, made that remark as he turned his eyeglass upon the Fal-staff of the New House.

staff of the New House.

Blake and Herries, and Digby and D'Arcy, the chuns of Study No. 6 in the School House, had cut across the quad to intercept the postman, in the hope of discovering a remittance. That hope had to intercept the postman, in the hope of discovering a remittance. That hope had been, unfortunately, dashed to the ground; there were no remittances for Study No. 6. It seemed to them that war economy, among their relatives, was being carried to really inordinate lengths. But Fatty Wynn's round, plump face was beaming like unto a full moon. "Pleased!" said Fatty. "I should say so. It's very odd, but it's very welcome."

"There can't be a remittance on a postcard!" said Figgins, puzzled. "What is it? Your uncle in the Welsh Regiment got the V.C.?" "Oh, no."
"Well, what is it then?" demanded

Kerr.

Fatty Wynn held up the card, and all rativ Wym held ap the curs, which improves read it.

"Bai Jove!" said Arthur Augustus.

"A hampah!"

"A hamper in war-time!" ejaculated

Blake.

"Lucky bargee!" said Herries.
"Might introduce me to your Uncle Tom," remarked Dig. "I'd like to have Tom," remarked Dig. "I'd like to have a tame uncle like that."

"Isn't it ripping?" said Fatty Wynn joyously. "I was just talking about a study spread, too!"

"You generally are!" grinned Blake.
"But who's your Uncle Tom?" asked Ker. "I've never heard of your Uncle Thomas, Fatty?"

The fat Fourth-Former looked per-

"That's jolly odd!" ke admitted. "I don't know him either." plexed.

"Bai Jove!"

"Bai Jove!"
"I never knew I had an Uncle Tom," said Eathy Wynn. "Of course, a chap myth have an uncle and forget him—"
"You've got it by mistake," said Kerr.
"It's wrongly addressed."
"No, it sn't—look at it."
The juniors read the address on the card. It was plain enough: "David Llewellyn Wynn." There could be no mistake about that.

mistake about that.

"Must be a hoax, then," said Blake.

"Yaas, wathah! Some chap is hoaxin' Wynn, because he's such a gweedy boundah," remarked Arthur Augustus

D'Arcv. "You stuttering chump!" roared Fatty Wynn. "Who's a greedy boundah?"

"You are, deah boy."
"Hold my jacket a minute, Fig-Weally, Wynn, I twust you are not goin' to deny a fact which is vewy well known to all St. Jim's—yawooooh!"

known to all St. Jim's—yawoooon?

If there was an imputation which Fatty could not tolerate, it was that of greediness. The swell of the School House had no time to finish his remarks. He was too busily engaged in waltzing round with the New House junior, trying to keep his head out of chancery.

"Yawooh!" roared Arthur Augustus.

"Leggo! You are disawwangin' my collab! Vawooh-dwaggingf!"

"Leggo! You are disawwangm molecular! Yawooh—dwaggimof!"

Blake rushed to drag Fatty Wynn off,

Figgins interposed with a but George Figgins interposed with a sweet smile, and Blake and Figgins joined in the waltz. The next moment Herries and Kerr were pomfaelling, and Redfern dashed out of the New House with the firm resolve not to leave Digby unoccupied. School House and New House were generally ready for a row. It had been quite a friendly meeting two minutes before. Now it was a battle roval.

Trimble the raider! (See Chapter 5.)

Unfortunately for Blake & Co. they were very near the New House, and a crowd of the enemy came rushing to join up. "Kick 'em to the School House!

roared Lawrence.

"Hurrah! Dribble 'em home!"
"Yarooh!"

"Yarooh!"
"Give 'em socks!"
"Ha, ha, ha!"
"Oh, bai Jove! You uttah wotters!
Yawooh!"

In the midst of the laughing New House crowd, the School House Four were rushing across the quad.

were rushing across the quad.

They were deposited in a gasning bunch on the steps of the School House, and the New House juniors retreated, shouting with laughter.

Three Shell fellows came out of the School House together—Tom Merry and Manners and Lowther. They regarded the Fourth-Formers on the steps with great interest.

"What are you chaps doing there?"
inquired Tom Merry.
"Grooogh!"

"Taking a nap, Gussy?" asked Monty Lowther.

Yawoooh" "That isn't your study armchair, Blake," grinned Manners. "Don't you find that stone rather hard for a pillow?"

find that stone rather hard for a pillow?"
"Oh, crumba!"
Study No. 6 crawled to their feet. They were looking very untidy. The Terrible Three of the Shell chuckled as they surveyed them.
"Why didn't you join up, you slackers?" demanded Jack Blake indignantly. "It's a House row, you chumps!"
"You chaps shouldn't tackle the New House," said Lowther, shaking his head. "They're above the weight of the Fourth! Leave them to us!"

"Oh, rats!"

"Yaas, wathah—wats!"
"Yaas, wathah—wats!"
"We're jolly well going to tackle 'em again!" gasped Blake. "Fatty Wynn's expecting a hamper of tuck by the carrier—"

"A what?" ejaculated the Terrible

Three, with one voice.

"A hamper—in war-time, too!" said Herries. "We'll jolly well teach the* New House bounders to have hampers' of tuck in war-time! I mean, we'll teach them not to "Ha, ha, ha!"

"Ha, ha, ha!"
"What are you cackling at, you silly Shell fish?" roared Blake. "We're jelly well going to raid that hamper!
"My hat! Ha, ha! But-on: ite-but "You can buck us up it "we mid-but hamper."
"I'd, sudy ho of the Fourth, and rusu, the rotters when the hamper comes!"

"Yaas, wathah!"

"But—but I say——!" gasped Tom

Merry.

"Are you going to back us up?" roared Blake.
"Not exactly. But—".
"Then dry up!"
"But I say "."

"But I say—
"Oh, ring off!"
And Jack Blake & Co. tramped into the School House to get a brush up, which they badly needed, and then to lay plans for raiding the New House hamper—a Roland for an Oliver, which was quite justifiable under the circumstances.

Tom Merry and his chums looked at one another grinning.

"They're jolly well not going to raid that hamper!" exclaimed Tom Merry.

"They're jolly well not going to raid that hamper!" exclaimed Tom Merry.
"The duffers—they don't savvy—"
"Not Wynn's hamper from his Uccle Tom!" chuckled Manners.
"Ha, ha, ha!" berhaps wed better explain to them, or they'll-spoil a first-rate jape," said

Tom Merry thoughtfully.
THE GEN LIBRARY.—No. 492.

THE BEST 30: LIBRARY THE "BOYS' FRIEND" 30. LIBRARY, MONEY

The Terrible Three followed Blake & Co., into the house. They found the four juniors in Study No. 6, brushing down their dusty garments, still in a breath-less and wrathful condition. A number of the Fourth had gathered there, too, at Jack Blake's suprons—Illian and of the Fourth had gathered there, too, at Jack Blake's summons—Julian, and Kerruish, and Hammond, and Reilly, and Levison, and Cardew, and Clive, and several others. And they were all evidently keen upon joining Study No. 6 on the war-path.

"We'll jolly well have the hamper, rather!" Levison was saying. "Why, it's beastly unpatriotic to have tack-hampers in war-time. We stand up for restriction in this House."

rampers in war-time. We stand up for patriotism in this House."
"Yaas, wathah!"
"We'll jolly well collar the hamper, as a warning."

"Good egg!"
"And scoff the tuck, as another warning "Hear hear!" "I say!" Tom Merry looked into the crowded study. "Before you kids go on the giddy war-path—"

"Are you alludin' to us as kids, Tom Mewwy?"
"Yes. Before you raid that that hamper—"i" rapped out Blake. "No Shell-fish wanted here. You're no good against the New House. Slide out!"

"But I want to tell you-"Rats!"

"Push 'em out!"

"Yash, wethah! This is a mattah for the Fourth to deal with, Tom Mewwy. You Shell boundahs wun away." "But I want to warn you!" roared Tom Merry.

Tom Merry's warning, whatever it was, was never uttered. Study No. 6 made a rush, and the Ferrible Three were bowled out into the passage.
"You silly chumps!" b bellowed

You silly chumps!" be wther. "We came to tell you-Lowther. "Rate!"

"That hamper--" shricked Manners. "That hamper's ours. Push off!
"But I tell you—" raved raved Tom

Merry.
"My hat! They're wound up! Take 'em home!" said Blake.

"Hands off, you silly fags! jiminy !"

dozen of the Fourth rushed the A dozen of the Fourth rushed the Shell fellows along the passage, to No. 10 in the Shell. They were bundled into it and strewn upon the floor, gasping for breath. Blake changed the key to the outside of the lock.
"You stay here!" he said. "This is a you stay here!" he said. "This is a Fourth Form matter, and Shell bounders can mind their own bizney. That hamper belongs to the Fourth."

And Blake slammed the door, and turned the key—outside.

rned the key—outside.
The three Shell fellows sat up, and

The three Shell fellows sat up, and blinked at one another.

"Oh, my hat!" said Tom Merry.

"Those cheeky fags want sitting on!" gasped Manners.

"Study No. 6 is getting its ears up, and it wants sitting on badly!" and sitting the same strong on badly!"

'Come and unlock this door, cheeky chumps!" roared rattling the door-handle.

But Blake & Co. were gone. Lowther,

CHAPTER 3. The Raiders !

ATTY WYNN took the postcard from his pocket, and read it over for about the tenth time. plump face was very satisfied.
"Isn't it ripping?" he remarked, a for the tenth time. he remarked, also for the tenta time.

Figgins grunted.

"All very well," he said. "But I don't know about tuck hampers in warThe Gem Library.—No. 492.

time. Looks to me like busting the grub | rules

"Oh, that's all rot," said Fatty Wynn.
"A chap's uncle wouldn't do that.
There are lots of things that are allowed -such as toffee and eggs and honey and oatcakes and things. And sardines and pickles and

"But you say you haven't an Uncle said Kerr.

"Well, I don't remember having one," admitted Fatty Wynn cautiously "but I must have one, as he's sending me a hamper."

"Wrong address got on the card more likely," said Figgins.

"Wrong address got on the cate more likely," said Figgins.
"Oh, that's rot!"
"Or it's a jape," said Kerr. "and there isn't a hamper at all. Might be just a School House duffers aug."
"But those School House duffers aug."

gested that and they wouldn't, if it was a House rag. Well, that's so. But-

"Anyway, we'll see when the carrier mes," said Fatty Wynn. "He's nearly comes, comes, said Fatty Wynn. "He's nearly due now. Let's go down to the gates and wait for him."

"Mind, if there's anything against the grub rules in that hamper, it's got to be given up!" said Figgins.
"All right!" said Fatty Wynn, with a sigh, "I agree to that. Let's get down and wait for the carrier."
Firgins & Co. sauntered down to the Figgins & Co. sauntered down to the Fatty was in a mood of great anticipation.

"We ought to be getting on with the rehearsal, you know," remarked Kerr. Kerr was stage-manager and general manager and president, and several other things of the N.H.J.A.D.S.—the New House Junior Amateur Dramatic Society. "The fellows will be getting ready in the Common-room." "Never mind that now," said Fatty.

"We can rehearse any day. Chap doesn't "But it's time for the rehearsal—"
"Oh, bother the rehearsal!"

On, bother the renearsal?

Fatty Wynn was generally a very easy-going fellow. But he could be obstinate, and he was obstinate now. Figgins & Co. and the rest of the drama-Figgins & Co. and the rest of the drama-tic society were engaged upon a new play, written by Kerr, entitled "The New Boy." It was a school play, founded upon some of their own experi-ences, and all the New House fellows arreed that it was a regular corker. Kerr played the leading part or was a the release of the result of the re-turn of the result of the re-turn of the re-tu the rehearsal of "The New Boy" than in the expected hamper; but Fatty Wynn had his way, and the three juniors watched at the school gates for the carrier from Rylcombe. Old Cripps was almost due now, and they had not long to wait.

As the carrier's cart came along the road, Figgins & Co. stepped out to meet it. Mr. Cripps drew his old horse to a halt outside.

"Anything for me, Crippey?" asked

Fatty Wynn eagerly. "Yes, sir; a 'amper," said Mr. Cripps.
"Oh, good!"
Fatty Wynn beamed. There had been ratty Wynn beamed. There had been a dreadful possibility that the postcard from "Uncle Tom" was a hoax, as Fatty Wynn did not remember any Uncle Tom in his family. But the arrival of the hamper was proof positive.

Mr. Cripps pulled out the hamper, and corried it in at the arrival of the control of the state of the control of the cont

Mr. Cripps pulled out the hamper, and carried it in at the gates, to deliver at the porter's lodge. Figgins & Co. followed in great spirits. A hamper was an unusual treat in war-time, and in the midst of strict food regulations. And it was a large hamper, and evidently heavy. And the label on it left no doubt that it was intended for David Llewellyn. Wynn of the New House. "Heah it is, deah boys!"

It was Arthur Augustus D'Arcy's voice. From the cover of the porter's lodge dozen juniors appeared quite suddenly, Fourth Formers of the School House.

They made a rush for the hamper as Cripps laid it down. "School House cads!" shouted Figgins. "Look out!" Figgins. "Look out!"
"Give 'em socks!"
"Collar the hamper!"

"Yaas, wathah! Huwway!" roared Arthur Augustus, waving his eyeglass in great excitement.

great excitement.

Taggles, who had come out of his lodge, was pushed in one direction; Mr. Cripps was pushed in another; Figgins & Co. went spinning before the rush of heavy odds. And half a dozen School House fellows collared the hamper, and maded it away in the tryinkling of an rushed it away in the twinkling of an eye.

"My heye!" gasped Taggles.
"Oh, lor!" said Mr. Cripps.
Figgins & Co. staggered up. Blake
& Co. were xushing the hamper away at top speed, bumping it occasionally on the ground in their hurry. The New House trio rushed in pursuit. "Gimme my hamper!" roared Fatty Wynn.

The raiders were not heading for their House; it was scarcely possible to take the hauper there. They headed for the wood-shed, which was safe from the undestred interference of masters and prefects. The hauper was rusted triumphantly into the shed. Figgins & Co. fects. The hamper was rushed triumphantly into the shed. Figgins & Co. dashed in after it, and were promptly seized and pitched out again.
"Wag them!" shoute

shouted Arthur Augustus

Dribble 'em!"

"Dribble 'em!"
"Ha, ha, ha!"
The three New House fellows fled.
The wood-shed door was slammed after them; and Blake & Co. gathered in triumph round the captured booty.
"This is where we smile!" chortled

"This is where we smile!" chortled Blake. "Easy as falling off a form! Anybody can do these New House asses in the eye!"
"Yaas, wathah! Huwway!"

"Better get it open," suggested Car-ew. "Figgy will be comin' back with a New House mob in a minute or two."
"Yes, rather! We'll collar the tuck, and leave the empty hamper here," and leave the chuckled Julian.

Gimme a penknife somebody."

"Heah you are, deah boy."

Jack Blake jabbed at the cords on the Jack Blake jabbed at the cords on the hamper. There was a sudden crash as the window of the wood-shed flew open. "Look out!" shouted Clive. Through the window came George Figgins of the Fourth, headlong. The School House juniors rushed at him; but Karr and Wwyn came turphliw; in ofter Kerr and Wynn came tumbling in after him, and then Owen and Lawrence and Redfern. The New House forces higathered quickly on news of the raid.

The hamper was forgotten for the moment. The wood-shed was the scene of a terrific struggle. Redfern broke loose and threw open the door, and Diggs and Koumi Rao and Pratt and Thompson and a crowd more New House juniors poured in. The odds were against Blake & Co. now.

Fortune had not favoured Study No. 6.
In a few minutes the School House heroes were on their backs on the floor, amid a sea of faggots overturned in the struggle, with New House fellows sitting struggle, with New House fellows sitting on them and pinning them down.

"Our win!" panted Figgins.
"Gwoogh! Gewwoff my neck, Kerr, you bony boundah!"
"Ha, ha, ha!" chuckled Figgins.
"Sit on 'em! We'll open the hamper here, and let 'em watch us scofling the tuck!"

"Ha, ha, ha!"
"Yah! Food-hogs!" roared Herries.

"Bow-wow!

"Bow-wow!"
George Figgins finished uncording the hamper. Fatty Wynn, with glistening eyes, threw back the lid, and disclosed straw packing within. The hamper was full, under the packing. "Now we sha'n't be long!" grinned Fatty Wynn; and his plump hands were busy at once. ..

CHAPTER 4.

Uncle Tom Merry. H. Gewwoff my cwumbs! neck! "Get off my waistcoat, Red-

"Oh dear!"

Blake & Co were not enjoying themselves. Each of the School House fellows was

Each of the School House fellows was pinned down by a New House junior, who sat on him. From that uncomfortable position they watched the opening of the big hamper. They watched it with fed-ings almost too deep fer words. That hamper was theirs by all the laws of war! They had collared it! And now of war! Iney mad consider it: Analysis, it was in the hands of the enemy again, and they were going to be helpless spectators of the New House feast. It was insult added to injury, and Blake & Co. writhed with wrath under their captors. But there was no help for it—the fortune of war was against them.

of war was against them.

The New House party, however, were in great spirits. A feast was a feast at any time, especially in war-time, and under the envious and furious eyes of their defeated rivals it had an added zest.

"Hand out the tompy!" grinned Redfern. "Mind you don't break any grub rules; but hand out the tommy!"

"Ha, ha, ha!"
"You shall have some of the ginger-beer Blake, if there is any, Blake," pro-mised Redfern. "I'll give you a little— down your neck."

"And Gussy shall have some jam, if there's any," said Kerr. "I'll give him some—in his ears!"
"Gwoogh!"

"Ha, ha, ha!"
"You howwid ass, I wefuse to have jam placed in my ceahs!" roared Arthur Augustus frantically.

Ha ha! Buck up with that hamper,

Fatty ! Fatty Wynn was dragging out the straw packing, with a fat face full of de-lighted anticipation.

But a change came over his countenance when the straw was removed. He looked startled Under the straw was a thick layer of sacking.

"That's jolly queer!" said Figgins.
"A blessed old potato-sack! I suppose your uncle hasn't sent you 'tatoes?"
Fatty Wynn dragged the sack-away.

Then he gave a yell.
Under the sack was not a luscious assortment of tuck. Far from it. What was disclosed to view was a closely-packed was disclosed to view was a closely-packed array of half-bricks, chunks of wood, and stones, with a few lumps of clay and some cabbage-stumps. Fatty Wynn gazed at that startling collection with distended eyes. . "

"Mum-mum-my hat!" he gasped.
Figgins stared blankly into the hamper.
"Wha-a-at!" he gasped.

"What is it?" demanded Redfern.
"Bricks!" said Fatty Wynn faintly.
"Chunks of wood! Cabbage-stumps!
Oh, crumbs!"
"What!"

"There's something here!" exclaimed Figgins. He draw a sheet of cardboard from among the amazing articles packed in the hamper. A message was scrawled on it in large letters. All the fellows

"Dear Old Porpoise,—I hope you will enjoy this hamper. You can eat all the contents without offending the Grub Conenjoy time contents without one contents without one froller. Best wishes. "Your affectionate, "Your affectionate, "Your Meri

"(alias Tom Merry)."

"Tut-Tut-Tom M-M-M-Merry!" stuttered Fatty Wynn.

"Ha, ha, ha!" roared Blake.

It was the turn of the School House fellows to smile. Blake & Co. understood now why the Terrible Three had wanted to warn them against, raiding that hamper. Fatty Wynn gazed at the hamper with

It was only a jape!

The School House japers were making merry at the expense of Fatty Wynn and well-known pining for the flesh-pots of Egypt.

"The the rotters!" gasped Fatty

"Ha, ha, ha!"
"Oh, cut that cackling, you School House asses!" shouted Figgins wrathfully. "I don't call this a joke! It's fully. "I don't call this a joke! It's idiotic!"

"Ha, ha, ha!"
"I wegard it as wathah funnay, deah boy! Ha, ha, ha!?"
"Pile in, Fatty!" yelled Levison.
"The Food Controller won't mind if you bolt the whole lot!"

bolt the whole lot:
"Ha, ha, ha!"
"Oh, kick those cackling idiots out!"
growled Figgins.
Blake & Co. were bundled out of the wood-shed, still yelling with laughter.
"The—the awful spoofers!" groaned
"L. Wenn "Must have been Tom

Fatty Wynn. Must have been low Merry sent that postcard, just to raise my hopes, you know. It—it's awful! It's— it's heartless!" Fatty Wynn almost wept. "I—I thought I was going to have wept. "1-1 thousand a feed! Oh dear!"

"Well, feed away!" grunted Redfern.
"After all, you can eat anything, you know. Your dashed appetite is a disgrace to the House!"

"Why, you cheeky ass—"
"And Figg; was bound to keep those School House Juffers here to see us made to look blessed fools!" said Lawrence.
"Just like Figgs!"
"How could I know what was in the hamper!" roared Figgins.

"Oh, rats!"

"Oh, rats!"
"The School House will be cackling themselves to death over this!" snorted Owen. "Fatty Wynn's ungarthly appetite is the standing joke of the school already. Lots of fellows say he must be breaking the grub rules, or he wouldn't be so fat!" "Who's fat?" yelled Fatty Wynn

You are-fat as a Hun frau!"

"Look here-"Br-r-r-r!"

"Oh, cheese it!" interrupted Kerr, the peace-maker. "Don't begin to rag now! We'll make the School House duffers sit up for this! It really looked like civil war among the New House heroes for a moment or the New House heroes for a moment or two. But Redfern & Co. marched out of the wood-shed, sniffing, and Figgins, Kerr, and Wynn were left with the ham-per. Fatty Wynn still eyed it mourn-fully. He had anticipated a glorious feed, and, like Rachel of ancient times, he mourned for what was lost, and could not

"Rotters!" he mumbled. "I don't call this a joke! It's like the tortures of Tantalus, you know. Horrible!"

"Br-r-r-r-r!" said Figgins crossly.

could read it, as the astounded Figgins theld it up to view.

And the message ran s Indianally. "And that silly ass, calling me fat! Trimble's fat, if you like!" said Wynn Indianally. "I'm not fat! I'm grow- ing thinner, too. I've often thought I will shall fade away since the grub rules came shall fade away since the state of the shall fade away!" satd Figgins sarcastically. "Look here, Fatty, this won't do! The whole school will be chording over this. It's all through your blessed appetite! You're always talking about grub, and wondering when the war's coming to an end, and all that, and it won't do. You're getting our House which at."

"Blow the House, and blow you!" said Fatty Wynn truculently. "I should think you might sympathise with a pal after a fearful disappointment like this." And Fatty Wynn marched off, frowning.

Figgins and Kerr shook their heads very seriously, as they followed him. They felt that there fat chum was not grinning and bearing it in a way that be-came the New House, and Tom Merry's little joke with the hamper put the lid on, so to speak. There was serious danger that Fatty Wynn's pining for the good things of existence might cast a slur upon the patriotism of the New House. It was everybody's duty to accept grub rules as if he loved them, and to munch war-bread as if he liked it.

"We shall have to take Fatty in hand," said Figgins, frowning. "Fancy asking how long the blessed war's going of course, we all want peace, but not for the sake of a feed."

Kerr grinned.

werr grinned.
"Poor old Fatty!" he said. "He feels it more than we do."
"Well, a chap's got to take it and smile," said Figgins. "Hallo, you funny-faced curiosities, what are you cackling att".

The Terrible Three met them in the uad smiling. They had been let out of quad-smiling. They had been let out of their study at last. "Did Fatty enjoy the hamper?" chortled Monty Lowther.

"Has he thoroughly digested the cabbage-stumps?" yelled Manners.
"Is he going to thank Uncle Tom nicely?" chuckled Tom Merry.

"Ha, ha, ha!

Figgins and Kerr walked away without replying, leaving the chums of the Shell laughing loudly. The two Fourth-Formers came their study in the new House, and found Fatty Wynn there, with a lugubrious expression on his fat face. "I say, what are we going to have for tea?" asked Fatty.

"Same as usual—bread-and-scrape, and not much of that," said Figgins gruffly.
"Good enough in war-time, too."
"There isn't any sugar," murmured

Fatty.
"Is there ever any, fathead?".

"No sardines left!
"Bother 'em!"

"I-I say, I'm hungry!". "Br-r-rr

"Br-t-ri" I—I say, Figgy, was there anything in the paper to-day about peace?" Figgins did not reply. He made a sign to Kerr, and they seized their fat studymate, and bumped him on the heartner. And the unhappy Fatty did not ask anything more about peace.

CHAPTER 5 Trimble on the Track !

OU ought to have told us, reafful assos! said Arthur Augustus D'Arcy severely.
"Oh, you Fourth Form kids would have given the show away!" said THE GEM LIBRARY.-No. 492.

8 THE BEST 38. LIBRARY THE "BOYS' FRIEND" 38. LIBRARY, NOW ON Tom Merry. "You know what you are Gussy, especially!" "I wegard that wemark as dis "There was room for it," remarked blake. "Ghon!" "Go hon!"

"Go hon!"
"Howevah, it was weally a vewy funndy ideah to send Wynn a hampah," conceded the ewel of the Fourth.
Study No. 6 and the Terrible Three were talking in the upper passage, when largey Trimble of the Fourth came along. Trimble paused to listen. He along. Trimble paused to listen. He generally did.

"Fatty Wynn's our game now," remarked Monty Lowther. "Fatty is a relief from war worry. Of course, Fatty is a good sort—not a fat prig like Trimble Perhaps Monty observed Baggy out of the corner of his eye.

"Look here, you know!" exclaimed

Trimble indignantly.

"Hallo! You there?" exclaimed Low-there blandly. Buzz along, Baggy-nothing to eat here."

"I—I say, what's that about a hamper?" asked Baggy Trimble. "Did you say somebody had sent Fatty Wynn a hamper, Gussy?"

"I wefuse to be called Gussy by you,

Twimble!"

"I don't think chaps ought to have hampers in war-time," said Baggy, "I don't call it patriotic. Look here, you chaps, if Fatty Wynn's got a hamper, we ought to-to collar it, see a warning, you know. I don't believe in food-hogging. If you fellows like to back me up-"Ha, ha, ha!"

Baggy Trimble was rather late in the day with his designs on the hamper sent by "Uncle Tom." But the mere mention by "Uncle Tom." But the mere mention of a hamper was enough to make the fat junior's mouth water. Fatty Wynn's appetite, compared with Trimble's, was as moonlight unto sunlight—as water as moding unto suning in-as water "I don't see what you're cackling at," said Bagy. "Look here, you know, I've been looking for you chaps to back me up. Funds are required."

Bai Jove!"

"I expect you to hand out something handsome," said Trimble. "You ain't quite so patriotic as I am—."
"My hat!"

"My hat!"
"But when it's a question of backing up a chap at the Front, I think you will line up," said Trimble. "I expect you to, in fact."
"You fat duffer, what are you driving at?" demanded Tom Merry. "Lot you care about the chaps at the Front."
"You've heard of old Lomax?" said

Baggy unheeding.

"Eh? Yes."

"He's called up again."

"Bai Jove!"

The juniors knew all about Mr. Lomax, of Rylcombe. Some time before he had come home wounded from the war, and Arthur Augustus had engaged motor-car to bring him home to his little house, and the car had been decorated with flags and bunting—a reception which had considerably astonreption which had considerably assonished Private Lomax.

"He's gone again," said Baggy Trimble. "They're combing out the old soldiers now, you know, and Lomax has gone. I saw Mrs. Lomax in the village the other day, and she looked awfully down in the mouth. She was trying to come amount at the grocer's, and she sugar at the grocer's, and get sugar at the grocer's, and she couldn't have any."

Wotten!" growled Arthur Augustus."
I heard her felling Sands, the grocer, that she hadn't had any sugar for the children for some time, excepting some that was given her by a kind friend."
said Baggy. "I thought it was awfully rotten, you know. Kids need sugar, you The Gem Libbary.—No. 492.

1 thought 1d raise a bit of a sub-scription for Mrs. Lomax," explained Trimble. "I've been thinking it out. How much can you fellows stand?" Tom Merry & Co. gave Baggy expressive looks

They were very sympathetic towards poor Mrs. Lomax, but they had no inten-tion whatever of handing Trimble cash, to enable him to dodge the food regulations—for that was certainly what the cheerful Baggy intended. Cash handed to Baggy Trimble would have gone as far as the nearest shop where he could obtain something eatable for it, and no "Well?" said Baggy briskly.
"How much can

"Well:" said Bags," asked you a question. "How much can you stand?"
"I think we've stood about as much as we can stand of you," said Monty Low-Travel!

"I hope you're not going to be mean," id Baggy Trimble. "Look here, you "1 nope you re not going to said Baggy Trimble. "Look here, you know if cash is short, suppose we raid Fatty Wynn's hamper, and—and confiscate it? You fellows can get hold of it, you know, and hand the things over into my charge-"Ha, ha, ha!"

"Ha, ha, ha!"
"Of course, if you're funky of those
New House bounders— Yah! Leggo ny ear, Herries, you beast!" Herries did not let go. He compresed his finger and thumb upon Trimble's fat ear, and led him to the stairs, and kicked him. Baggy Primble travelled down the stairs are a stair of the stairs and compress of the stairs and the stairs are a stair.

Agent and shock a fat fist at Herries, who gasp, and shook a fat fist at Herries, who grinned down at him.

"Yah! You rotter! Come down here and I'll lick you!" roared Trimble. "Right-ho!"

Herries came down, but, on second thoughts, Baggy Trimble decided not to wait. He scuttled down the lower stairs and vanished.

In the quadrangle Figgins & Co. passed him, going towards the gym. Trimble blinked after them. His thoughts were running on Fatty Wynn's hamper.

The New House chums disappeared into the gym, and Baggy, after some thought, rolled off to the New House.

If there was a hamper, it would be found in Wynn's study—or at least some of its contents; and Baggy Trimble intended to sample those contents.

tended to sample those contents.

Baggy was quite indignant at the idea of food-hogging going on in the New House. If there was any food-hogging to be done at St. Jim's, Baggy was quite prepared to attend to it.

Trimble looked round him anxiously, as he scuttled into the New House. It was decidedly a dangerous proceeding to raid the rival House, and Baggy was not a hero. But the coast was clear; and the fat School House junior slipped unob-served into Figgins' study in the Fourth Form passage.

He closed the door after him, and looked hurriedly round the study. There was no sign of a hamper.

Baggy peered into the cupboard. Like the celebrated Mrs. Hubbard's, it was bare. The study seemed as clear of food as if a swarm of Huns had been there.

"Rotters!" mumbled Baggy disconsolately. "Cads! Hidden it away! I know there-was a hamper—those other beasts were talking about it. They must beasts were taking about it. Any much have some of the grub here somewhere."

Baggy Trimble was not a very scrupulous youth; and when he was on the track of food, what scruples he had vanished at once. Figgins & Co. being safe in the gym, Baggy felt that he had time to make a search, and he made it he turned out the room right and left in search of the supposed supplies.

There was a leather bug in a corner, with the initials, "D. Ll. W." on it. It was evidently David Llewellyn Wynn's was evidently David Llewellyn Wynn's property. Baggy opened it as a last chance, and peered into it.

Inside the leather bag there was a paper bag, and Baggy jumped as he saw it.
For the paper bag was full of sugar!
Baggy's oyes gleamed.

"My only aunt! Sugar!"

It was long since Baggy had seen so much sugar. But there it was—at least two pounds of loaf-sugar, crammed in the paper bag!

the paper bag! "Sugar was very carefully allowanced at St. Jim's. Fellows were allowed to have their tea in their studies, if they liked—but they were not allowed to exceed the fixed quantity. Lumps of sugar were told off, as if they had been pearls of great price, by the housekeeper. How of great come, they were to the sugar come at the sugar come of the sugar come. The sugar come is the sugar come of the sugar come at the sugar come of the sugar come. House study? "Hoarding!" "Hoarding!" ejaculated Baggy.
"Awful rotter! Hoarding sugar when other people are going short! Disgust-ing! Like those beasts who go round motor-cars gathering up food! I'm in motor-cars gathering up lood! I'm jolly well going to confiscate that sugar." Baggy Trimble promptly confiscated three or four lumps by immediately transferring them to his mouth. He lifted the paper bag up next, and considered how the plunder was to be concealed about his person. And just it: that moment the study door was thrown open. Trimble spun round in alarm.

Fatty Wynn had returned.
The New House junior had come in for his bat. But he forgot all about his bat, as he saw the open bag, and Trimble munching sugar.
"You fat rotter!" roared Wy

"Oh! I-I--!"
Fatty Wynn rushed at him Trimble let go the sugar bag as he was waltzed round the study.

let go the sugar bag as he was waltzed round the study.

"Yarooh!" roared Trimble. "Yah! Hoarder! Legge! Yawp!"

The School House junior went-spinning into the passage. Fatty Wynn, crimson with wrath, followed him there. dribbling Trimble down the passage like a football. The raider went down the stairs three at a time, yelling.

How he got out of the New House Baggy Trimble, hardly knew. Fatty Wynn, fuming with wrath, returned to his study. He did not take his bat and join Figins and Kerr on the cricket-ground. He picked up the leather bag and carried it out of the study. Haggy Trimble, under the impression that Wynn was still pursuing him, dashed across the quadrangle at top speed, and bolted up the steps of the School House, and bolted into Levison, Cardew, and Clive, who were coming out together. The podgy junior smote them like a battering ram, and there was a roar as they rolled over together on the steps. together on the steps.

CHAPTER 6. The Hoarder !

)H!" "Ah."
"You howling ass!"
Levison and Co. were quickly on their feet, but Baggy Trimble sat and gasped. He was winded.
"What do you mean by rushin' into us like that, you fat idiot?" shouted Cardew. "Grooh!"

"Grooh!"
"Jump on him!" gasped Clive.
"Yow-ow! Keep him off! That New, House beast!" gurgled Baggy.

"There isn't anybody after you, you duffer!" growled Levison.
Trimble blinked round, and was relieved to see no sign of Fatty Wynn. He scrambled to his feet.

"I-I say," I-I've been nearly alaughtered!" he gaped. "Just because I feet. Who's hoarding!" asked Clive. "Wynn, of course."

"Wynn, of course.
"Rot!"

"I found it in his study—no end of sugar!" panted Trimble. "I—I thought he was up to something of the sort, so I—I went to investigate. And there it was—a bag crammed with it—lumps of was—a bag crammed with it—lumps of sugar, you know."

"Rubbish!" growled Levison.
"He went for me like a maniac!" gasped Baggy. "Look here, I've a jolly good mind to go to his Housemaster! He's no right to hoard sugar."
"If you diagrace your House by sneak."

ing, you fat rotter, you'll get a ragging!" said Clive, frowning. "I don't believe a word off it, either."

"I saw it!"

"I-T've got some of the sugar!" panted Trimble. "Look here!" Three lumps were still clutched in his fat hand.

"My hat!" said Levison. The three juniors stared at the sugar. As it was past tea-time, they were quite certain that Baggy hadn't any of his own allowance left. Evidently he had raided those lumps in the New House.

"Just like a New House cad!" said

Trimble. "Hoarding, you know! Awful, it? I never had enough sugar, and n't it? I never had enough sugar, and here's that New House bounder hoard-ing it. It's actually against the law, you know. Pounds and pounds of it. Heaps, in fact! Stacks!" Trimble's fertile imagination was getting loose. "Stacks of it, you know—stacks of sugar! A big travelling-bag crammed with it! What do you think of that?" Several fellows are gathering round to the stack of the stack of the stack of the Best of the stack of the the stack Half-accord other follows the scene. Half-a-dozen other fellows stopped.

Naturally the St. Jim's fellows were down on the mere idea of hoarding, with a very heavy down.

They knew that food-hogs with plenty of money sometimes bought up big sup-plies for their own use, leaving their poorer neighbours to get on as best they could. But that a St. Jim's fellow should do anything of the kind was too rotten. t was a disgrace to the old school.

"Blessed if I'd have thought it of Fatty!" said Blake, with a whistle.

"I we give

"I wefuse to ewedit Twimble's statement, Blake," said Arthur Augustus. "He is a feahful Pwussian, as you vewy well know."
"He's got some of the sugar," remarked Levison.
"Whe's did you cat the sugar,"

"Where did you get that sugar,

"In Wynn's study in the New House, I tell you. He's got stacks and stacks of it."

Bai Jove! There's Wynn!

All eyes were turned on the fat New House junior, as he was spotted going down to the gates, with a leather-bag in his hand.

"That's the bag!" shouted Trimble.
"That's the bag it was in! He's taking it away to hide it now I've seen it. Stop him!

him!" "I wefuse to cwedit—"
"Stop him!" howled Trimble.
The School House juniors looked at one another.
Trimble's reputation for truthfulness was on a par with the Kaiser's. But-his eagerness to have platic Wynn stopped was pretty clear proof that he was telling the truth this time, or as near the truth as it was pos-sible for a fellow like Baggy to get.

"Come on!" said Tom Merry abruptly. "Yome on!" said Tom Merry abruptly.
"Wynn had better show what he's got in that bag, if only for his own sake."
"Yaas, wathah! But I wefuse to ewedit..."

cwedit-"Come on!"

The whole party of juniors rushed down to the gates, and overtook Fatty Wynn there.

Fatty stared at them as they sur-rounded him.
"No larks!" he exclaimed. "I'm

"No larks!" he exclaimed. "I'm going out—"
"What have you got in that bag?" demanded Mellish of the Fourth.
"Find out!" snapped Wynn.
"Sugar!" yelled Trimble. "He's going to hide it!"
Fatty Wynn flushed.
Fatty Wynn flushed.
"Tall screne, Fatty," said Tom Merry.
"Tall start' a House rag. Trimble says "Trimble's a fat liar!" growled Wynn.
"Yaas, wathah."

"He says you've got it in that bag."
"Oh, rats!"
"Let's look in the bag!" sneered Mel-

Fatty Wynn's grasp tightened on the tag.

"Look here, Wynn, you'd better open the bag," said Tom Merry seriously. "I don't believe you've got hoarded grub there, but it's better to clear it up. Let the follows see what's in it."

Fatty Wynn's flush deepened.

"It's my bag, and what's in it is mine,!" he said stubbornly. "I'm not going to open it. Let me pass."

"Bai Jove!"

"Fatty!"

"Fatty!"
"He's going to hide his hoards!"
howled Trimble. "Collar him!"
"Look here, Eatty, if you don't open that bag, you know what everybody will think," said Jack Blake.
"Oh, rats!"

"You wefuse to open it, Wynn?"
"Yes, I do."

"Pway allow me to wemark-" growled

Will you let me pass?'
Fatty Wynn.
"No, we wanth at we won't," said Kangaroo "If you're hoarding the Shell coolly. "If you're hoarding sugar, at a time when poor people can't get any, you ought to be shown up.

"Yaas, wathah!"

"I'm not, you silly idiot! But-

"There can't be anything private in the bag, that a fellow mustn't see," re-marked Levison. "You haven't been robbing your Housemaster's safe, I suppose?"
"Oh, don't be an ass!" At a bag?"

"Then why don't you open the bag?"
"Because I won't! It's not your business!"

Tom Merry knitted his brows. Wynn's refusal could mean only one thing—that there was hoarded sugar in the bag.
Every fellow's face expressed the same opinion—that Wynn was taking his hoard away to hide it, now that it had noard away to fide it, now that it had been discovered in the school.

"Collar him," said Blake tersely,

"we'll see for ourselves!"

"Yaas, I quite appwove, undah the

"Let me pass!" shouted Fatty Wynn. And he made a fierce rush into the road. The next moment a dozen pairs of hands grasped him. He held on grimly to the bag; but it was forced open. There was a shout as the contents were seen. "Sugar !"

"Bai Jove!"
"You hoardin' cad!"

"You noarun each."
Shame!"
Fatty Wynn was released. With a crimson face, he closed the bag, and clicked the lock. The juniors stood back.

clicked the lock. The juniors stood back. He could pass now. Without a word, Fatty Wynn tramped away, bag in hand. "Ain't you going to collar it?" yelled Trimble. "Look here, it ought to be confiscated! I want some!" on Merry. "Oh, shut up!" growled Tom Merry.

"Oh, shut up!" growled Tom Merry. Nobody wanted to touch Fatty Wynn's hoard-except Trimble. He was welcome to what satisfaction he could get out of it, now that he was held up to public shame as a hoarder. The juniors went in at the gates with scornful looks.

CHAPTER 7.

A Shock for Figgins.

NIGGINS and Kerr were puzzled. They were at cricket practice, and a crowd of other fellows were there. Figgins, who was not specially observant, noticed nothing at first; but George Francis Kerr, who was as keen as a Sheffield blade, very quickly spotted the fact that something was on. The sin of Fatty Wynn was fresh in the minds of the School House juniors. The incident was known to all the Lower School by this time, with the exception of Fatty Wynn's special chums. Nobody had cared to mention it to Figgins or Many fellows concluded that they were in it, too. It seemed difficult to believe that hoarding had gone on in their study without Figgy or Kerr knowing anything about it.

But Tom Merry & Co. did not think

They were astonished that Fatty Wynn had turned out to be a food-hog; and they would have wanted services about and they would have wanted agencies or proof before believing the same about Figgins and Kerr.

Doubtless Fatty Wynn had kept his hoard secret even from his study-mates.

hoard secret even from his study-mates. It was possible, at least. Fatty Wynn's Gargantuan appetite, and his desire for a speedy peace, which would mean the revival of study spreads, had become a standing joke among the juniors. It was well known that he groaned in spirit under the restraints of the food regulations. But it was a point of honour with the juniors to observe those regulations, and Fatty had not really been suspected of transgressing them. Fellows like Trimble and Racke and Crooke and Clampe would do so without scruple. But Fatty Wynn was not a fellow of that sort. At least, it had been believed that he wasn't.

The Head of St. Jim's had been re-luctant enough to restrict his boys; but the Food Controller's orders left him no choice. Most of them could afford to exceed the rules, so far as money went; Most of them could afford to exceed the rules, so far as money went; but the manifest unfairness of wealthy people eating their fill while poorer people went without made very few of them deeire to do so. Strict rules had been laid down; and, to a great extent, it was left to a fellow's sense of honour to obey them—though there was punishment if a "food-hog" was found breaking them.

Masters and prefects could not always be nosing into a fellow's study to see whether he was exceeding. Such a he was exceeding. whether he was exceeding. Such a system of miserable espionage was a little too Prussian. But the fact that they were not watched and spied upon made it all the more necessary for fellows to it all the more necessary for follows to play the game of their own accordanty Most of them did. And though Fatty Wynn was given to greating on the sub-ject, he had not been appeted of any-thing more than groung. All the follows naturally wanted to see the end of the terrible war that brought grief and bereavement into every household. But Fatty's longing for peace because it-would mean study spreads was taken THE GEM LIBRARY.—No. 492. humorously. They knew that Fatty had three relations at the Front, and that he thought a great deal more about them than about study spreads. His outbreak than about study spreads. 'His outbreak as a hoarder surprised everybody—it was not like old Fatty at all. ''It has weally astonished me feahfully,'' Arthur Augustus D'Arcy confided to the chume. I should have expected it if I with the state of the chume of the should have expected it if I with the should have sepected it is the should have supposed by the wealth of the should have seen a suppose be confeability hunger.'' suppose he got feahfully hungwy. "That's no excuse," growled Blake.

"If everybody did the same, it would mean people with money mopping up all the grub, and nothing at all left for the poor. And as the poor wouldn't stand it, that would mean trouble—and the food-hogs getting their plunder taken off them by force. That's the kind of thing that leads to hunger riots."

"They've had hunger riots in Germany, through rich pigs mopping up what grub was going," remarked Digby.

'Taint quite good enough for us.'
Arthur Augustus shook his head sadly.
atty Wynn's fall from grace was a painful surprise to him; but he regarded Fatty more in sorrow than in anger. And, as the subject was uppermost in the minds of the juniors, it was easy for the, keen-eyed Kerr to see that something was wrong, and he drew Figgins' attention to that fact.

"The fellows are jawing over something,

ing," said Kerr.
"Let 'em jaw!" said Figgins.

"Let em jaw: sam a "Something about us."
"Something about us."
"Wondering why we're jawing instead of fielding, perhaps."

"There's something going on, fat-head!"

"Lei it go on, then!"
Kerr called to Monty Lowther.
"What's up, Lowther?" Lowther coloured. He did not want to be the one to enlighten the New House chums as to Fatty Wynn's back-

"Up?" he repeated, to gain time.
"Yes; what's up?" demanded Kerr sharply.

"Prices," said Lowther, after some thought.

on, I mean?"
"Profiteering."

"Look here

"That's why prices are up!" explained Lowther blandly; and he strolled away. Figgins knitted his brows.
"Why don't the chump explain, then?" he exclaimed.

en?" he exclaimed. "Come on!" said "Come on!" said Kerr abruptly. The chums of the New House left the cricket-field, and bore down on Blake & Co., who were chatting outside the pavi-Co., who were chaining outside the pavi-lion after practice. Study No. 6 became quite silent all of a sudden. "Seen Wynn?" asked Figgins. "W-w-wynn!" stammered Arthur Augustus. "Yes. He went in for his bat, and he hasn't come back. Have you seen him?" Ya-a-a-s."

"What are you stammering about?" demanded Figgins, in astonish ment. "Was I—I stammerin', deah boy?"
"Yes; and you are now. Where's

"Yes; and you are now.
Wynn, if you're seen him?"
"He—he's gone out."
"The ass!" exclaimed Fig

"The ast" exclaimed Figgins. "I told him he was to do some batting!"
"Never mind Wynn," said Kerr quietly. "Suppose you fellows explain what it is that seeing jawed about up and down the field!"
"Bai Jove!"
"Oh, nothing."

and down the man.

"Bai Jove!" said Blake uneasily.

"Oh, nothing "said Blake uneasily.

"He, he, he!" That cachinnation came from Baggy Trimble, who was near at hand. "Why don't you tell 'em, Blake? They ought to know!"

THE GEM LIBRARY.-No. 492.

"Well, they'll know soon, anyway,"] said Herries.

"Know what?" roared, Figgins, his temper beginning to rise. "What's all the silly dashed mystery about you

"He, he, he! It's about Wynn!" cackled Trimble. "You, too! You're

"In what?" snapped Figgins. "Yah! Hoarders!"
"What?" shouted Figgins and Kerr together.

"Shut up, Twimble, you fat wottah! I wefuse to believe that Figgy or Kerr knew anything about it." "Rats! How could Fatty Wynn hoard

"Rats! How could Fatty Wynn hoard grub in their study without their know-ing!" eneered Trimble. "Too thin!" "Hoard grub in our study!" repeated Figgins. "Who's been hoarding grub in our study?"

"He, he! Fatty Wynn has— Yah!
Oh! Ah! Yah!" roared Trimble, as Oh! Ah! Yah!" roared Trimble, as Figgine grasp closed on his collar. Shake, shake, shake! "You fat scoundrel!" Figgins' voice trembled with anger as he shook Trimble till the fat junior quivered like a jelly. "You rotter! You slandering cad! If you weren't a measly, fat, unfit slacker and a cringing worm, I'd make you put your paws up, and lick you till you couldn't crawl!"

"Gug-gug-ug!" "Gur-gug-ug."

Figgins shook Trimble till his strong arm ached, and then toesed him contemptuously asked. The fat junior rolled in the grass spluttering. Then Figgins turned a glittering glance upon the School House juniors.

"I suppose you fellows don't believe that fat brute's lies about Wynn?" he asked, between his teeth.

There was a pause. But Figgins had

There was a pause. But Figgins had to be answered, and Blake answered him quietly.
"It's true, Figgins!"

CHAPTER 8.

Trouble in Figgins' Study!

EORGE FIGGINS came towards Blake, his fists clenched, and his eyes gleaming.

Blake quietly put his hands in his poekets.
"You say it's true?" said Figgins thickly.

"Yes. I'm sorry, but there you are! It's been proved."

"That's a lie!"

"Easy does it. Figgy!" murmured

Easy does it, Figgy!" murmured Kerr, catching his chum by the arm. Figgins glared at the Scottish junior. "I say it's a lie!" he roared. "It isn't, Figgy!" chided Kerr. "Don't be an ase! It's a mistake. "You have the same of the talking! What boot be an ass; it's a mistake. Now shut up while I do the talking! What do you fellows mean by saying that Wynn has been hearding grub in our study? He hasn't, or we should know it, and we don't know it." "As if Fatty would do anything of the

"As if Fatty would do anything of the sort!" burst out Figgins. "You School House cade

"Shush! Speak up. Blake, as you seem to know all about it." Blake reluctantly explained. He was not feeling angry at Figgy's violent words. He knew how Figgins must be feeling that stain on the honour of his Kerr listened quietly. The Scottish junior was never cooler than in a time of trouble or excitement. Figgins listened, fuming. But even Figgins' excitement fuming. But even Figgins' excitement died down as he heard what the juniors had seen.

"The sugar was in the bag, right enough," concluded Blake, "We wouldn't take Trimble's word. But there it was—as much as is allowed to one chap in a month, at least. I didn't see anything but sugar. But Fatty Wynn see anything but sugar. But Fatty Wynhad that, and a dozen fellows saw it."

"Yaas, wathah!"
Kerr looked keenly at the juniors. He had been as angry at first as Figgins, though more quiet in his anger. But it was impossible to doubt facts. The was impossible to doubt facts. The hoarded sugar had been seen in the bag, that was clear. And how had Fatty Wynn come by a quantity of sugar, unless he had disobeyed the orders of the Head, and purchased it secretly in excess of the allowance? That is to say, unless he was a hoarder? Figgins angry flush had paled now.

"I know it's rotten," said Blake. "We looked into it at first, as much to clear Fatty as anything. It was anything there it was!"

"Wynn feels the westwictions more than we do," said Arthur Augustus charitably. "I wecommend speakin' to him vewy severely. I am suah it is Wynn's first offence, and he will not weenent it." wepeat it."
"There's some mistake," muttered

Figure.

He was not angry now, but he looked worried and miserable.

"There wasn't much room for a mistake," said Dig. "It was sugar, and at the propose we "There was a take," said Dig. "It was sugar, and as least two pounds of it. I suppose we know lumps of sugar when we see em?"

""" understand it. How could be with the could "I can't understand it. How could Fatty hoard sugar or anything else without us knowing it? Even if he would, and he wouldn't!"

"Yah!" Trimble sat up in the grass.
"Yah! Food-hogs! You're all tarred with the same brush! You knew it all the time! Yah!"

Figgins did not even glance at Trimble. He turned and walked away with Kerr. The chums of Study No. 6 were left looking and feeling very uncomfortable.

"It's wotten!" said D'Arcy, quite dis-tressed. "A fellow playin' a mean twick like that disgwaces his studay. But, aftah all, it was only once "Rot!" snorted Trimble. "Rot!" snorted Trimble. "It's a regular habit of Wynn's, of course. He's a food-hog, and he ought to be shown "It's a He's

"Weally, Twimble-"I'm not going to overlook this!" said

Trimble loftily.
"You're not!" snapped Blake, contemptuously. "Who are you, you fat owl owl?"

"I'm a patriolic chap! I'm down on food-hogging. I'm jolly well going to let everybody hear about this!", said Trimble. "I'll make an example of him! He called me af the beat the other day-rae, you know! I'll give him fat beat!"

"Look here, Trimble, you can let it

"I'm not going to let it drop!" said Trin:ble triumphantly. "As a patriotic chap, I'm bound to make those New House rotters sit up for this. And I'm

And Trimble walked away.

"Well, it can't be helped!" said Blake. "I'm sorry for Figgy; but, after all, if a chap's a food hog he must expect to be jeered at. Let's go back to the nets!"

Meanwhile, Figins and Kerr lad gone to the New House, expecting to find their chum there. They were very anxious to hear what Fatty Wynn had to say on the subject.

But the fat Fourth-Former was still absent.

absent.
The fact that he had gone out, when he had been supposed to leave Little Side only to fetch his bat, looked suspicious in itself. Even to his chume it looked as if Fatty Wynn, finding his heard nosed out, had devoted himself at once to removing it into a place of safety.

Figgins and Kerr looked round their ing for grub. I never thought that a ludy, to see whether there was anyting else in the nature of a hoard.

"So you think I've done that!" roared study, to see whether there was any-

"You think so, Kerr, don't you?"
"I—I hope so."

"I—I hope so."
There was a step in the passage, and Redfern looked in. Redfern was looking perturbed and exasperated.
"You chaps heard?" he exclaimed.
"I suppose it's all over the school!"
said Figgins bitterly. "It's not true;
said Figgins bitterly. "It's not true;

there is a mistake somewhere, somehow. there is a mistake soinewhere, somehow."
"Doesn't look like it!" snapped Redfern. "A dozen fellows saw Wynn carting sugar about in a bag. He must have been buying it up secretly."
"He filsn't!" roared Figgins.
"Where did he get it blen!"
"How should I know, fathead?"
"How should I know, fathead? of singar," said Kern."
"How and a hoard of singar," said Kern."

sugar," said Kerr. "He never has sugar in his tea, even. Well, hardly ever. He's fond of sugar, but if he had a hoard, he fond of sugar, but if he had a hoard, he wouldn't take tea without sugar."

"He certainly had a hoard, because a dozen fellow have seen it," said Redforn, "We'll give him a chance to explain, if he can, and if he can't, he will be sent to Coventry by the House."

Redfern-"Look here, Figgins hotly.

"And you can't back him up, Figgy," said Redfern quietly. "You can't back up a food-hoarder in breaking the rules." "I wouldn't!" growled Figgins. "But it isn't so. Give a chap a chance to

"Hallo, here he is!"

Fatty Wynn, looking warm and dusty after his walk, came into the study, with a bag in his hand. He tossed the bag in a corner—evidently empty. Then he looked inquiringly at the grim facts of iooked inquiringly at the grim faces of the juniors.

"Anything up?" he asked.

"Yes." growled Figgins. "What have you been taking out in that bag?" Fatty Wynn flushed.
"Oh! Those School House idiota have been jawing to you, I suppose?"

claimed angrily.

claimed angrily.

"It's all over the school!" said Redfern. "It's clear enough that you had a lot of sugar in that bag, Wynn. You've taken it out of the school because that fat cad Trimble nosed it out. What have you done with it!"

"That's my bizney, Reddy!"

"It's our bizney, too, if you're a foodhoarder! said helfern augrily.

"Why you rotter—"

"Why you rotter—"

"Why where did you get the sugar?" demanded Redfern.

manded Redfern.

"Find out!" "That's enough!"

"That's enough!"
Redfern left the study. His face was grim, and his mind was evidently made up. Fatty Wynn's plump, rosy face became a little pale, as he looked at Fig-gins and Kerr. His eyes gleamed.
"So you think I'm a food-hog, do you?" he exclaimed.

"I never thought so before," said Fig-ins glumly. "We had no sugar to-day "I never thought so before," said Figgins glumly. "We had no sugar to-day for tea, and it seems you had pounds of it stacked away in a bag. You couldn't spare a lump for your own pals!"
"I—I—— You don't understand!"
faltered Fatty Wynn.
"No. I don't understand a chap acting like that," said Figgins bitterly I own that that Trimble goes about the along after the se expected it of you. I belop after shop when he's in funds, look

Wynn, "Oh, don't shout at me!" said Figgins savagely. "Do you want me to believe that lumps of sugar walked here of their own accord, and stacked themselves in your bag?"
Fatty Wynn compressed his lips.
"I never expected this!" he said.
"But if that's what you think, think it and be hanged! I don't care what you think!"

And Fatty Wynn stalked out of the study, and closed the door after him with a slam that rang through the New House.

Grundy of the Shell joined up, reason. too, for better motives. Grundy was indignant, and Grundy meant to make his indignation known far and wide. Baggy Trimble's idea was to demonstrate—a public demonstration that would make the New House fellows simply cringe. And Grundy of the Shell assented, and calmly took the leadership of the affair into his own hands.

The following day, after morning lessons, Grundy started in as the Shell fellows came out of the Form-room.

"Meeting in the Common-room!" sang out Grundy.

"Hallo! First I've heard of it!" said Tom Merry.

An insult to the New House. (See Chapter 10.)

CHAPTER 9. The Demonstration !

OM MERRY & Co. had determined to let the incident of the sugar drop. It was an unpleasant sub-ject, and they considered that ass said about it the better. less the less said about it the better. It was bad enough—but it was not fearly so bad as Baggy Trimble's endless dodges, for instance, for avoiding the grub rules. Baggy's indignation was quite out of place. They thought, too, that Fatty Wynn's House fellows would probably deal with him severely enough for bringing shame on the New House.

Most of the School House fellows agreed with Tom. They were at war with the rival House; but they did not want to take a mean advantage. But there were some fellows who did not agree.

Baggy Trimble was determined to make the most of it. As a rule Baggy was a nobody, and was quite disregarded. But he found backers on this occasion. Racke and Crooke of the Shell, finding that Tom and crooke of the Shen, inding that 10m Merry & Co. were against taking the matter up, determined to make as much capital out of it as they possibly could, in a spirit of opposition. Mellish of the Fourth joined in for the same amiable calling the meeting." "I'm Grundy loftily.

"You can attend it, too, old chap, and applaud your own speeches," said Monty owther.

Lowther.

"Mind you don't bore yourself to death!" remarked Manners. "You're rather long-winded, you know."

And the Terrible Three went out into the quadrangle, quite regardless of George Alfred Grundy and his meeting in the Common-room. Grundy snorted.

"Roll up, you fellows!" he exclaimed. "It's an important meeting. We're going to make the New House cads sit up for grub-hoarding."

grub-hoarding.

"I thought that was going to be dropped," said Talbot.
"Well, it isn't."

"Better let it drop," urged Talbot.
"It's only Wynn, anyway—and he's only

"It's only Wynn, anyway—and he's only done it once."

"I know best, Talbot!"

Talbot laughed, and walked on. The Shell fellows went their way, much to Grundy's indignation. Only Racke and, Crooke and Scrope remained with him. Even his own study-mates—Wilkins and Gunn—dodged out into the quad, and did not seem to hear Grundy's voice calling them back.

"The Cew Luwany.—No. 492.

THE GEM LIBRARY.-No. 492.

THE BEST 30: LIBRARY DE THE "BOYS' FRIEND" 30. LIBRARY. NOW OR 10

However, Mellish and Trimble joined up when the Fourth Form came out. Grundy found himself with five followers -and, as a matter of fact, they were the five fellows he disliked most in the School House—"smoky cads," as he called them himself. It really was hard lines that a himself. It really was hard lines that a leader like Grundy could not rake up a more respectable following than that. Such as it was, however, he had to make the best of it. He led his flock into the junior Common-room.

Trimble, apparently under the impression that he was leader, mounted on a chair to address the far from numerous meeting.

Gentlemen-!" he began. Grundy stared at him.

"What are you up to, fatty? Get off that chair !"

"Look here, Grundy—yah! Oh!"
Grundy unceremoniously pitched Trimble off the chair, and mounted it himself. There was no arguing with Grundy.
"Gentlemen!" said Grundy.

is an indignation moeting."

"Hear, hear!" yawned Racke.
"A St. Jim's fellow has been guilty of food-hogging. We're down on it. As a matter of fact, all you fellows have been caught food-hogging—"
"Et ?"

"I've whopped you for it myself, Racke-Racke—"

"You silly ass!"
"But I'm glad to see you're backing me up to put it down. We're going to demonstrate," said Grundy. "The New House have been hearding. We're going to hold a demonstration under their windows, and let 'em know what St. Jim's thinks of them!" "Bravo!"

"Follow me!" said Grundy, jumping down.

He led the way to the quad, and the meeting followed him. As they marched across the quadrangle Tom Merry bore down on them.

"Join up!" said Grundy. But the captain of the Shell had not "Look here, Grundy, if you're going to rake up that affair about Wynn—"

he began.

he began.
"We're going to hold a demonstration against food-hogs," said Grundy loftily.
"Well, you've got a gang of food-hogs with you, if you come to that." said Tom. "Wynn's in trouble in his own House, I hear. Let it drop."

"Rats! With that Grundy marched on, and his followers, with defiant looks at Tom Merry, marched in his wake.

The demonstration arrived at the New House, and halted under Figgin's study window. Whether the Co. were at home they did not know. But that did not matter. Their demonstration was certain not to pass unnoticed.

"Now, then, all together," said Grundy. He raised his powerful voice to a roar. "Yah! Food-hogs!" roared his followers in turn.

"Yah! Hoarders!"
"Yah! Hoarders!" repeated Racke &

"Yah! Houses. Co.

There was a suden rush from the porch of the New House. Figgins, Kerr, Redfern, Owen, and Lawrence came dashing out with angry faces. The demonstration, curious as it was, had stirred up the New House fellows.

The New House juniors did not trouble to speak. They charged.

"Back up!" roared Grundy truently. "Down with New House foodboogs!"

Grundy put up a terrific fight. But his followers broke and fled at the first on-THE GEM LIBRARY.—No. 492.

chased them across the quad.
Grundy of the Shell was left to fight the battle on his own.

He was not quite equal to the task.
Three or four New House fellows seized him, and he was swept off his feet, and rushed away to the big fountain. Splash!

Head and shoulders Grundy went into the fountain. He came out again spluttering and gasping.

"Grooh! Hooh! Yooooh!"

Bump!

Figgins & Co. sat him down on the step the fountain—hard—and left him. Grundy rubbed water out of his eyes and his hair, and blinked about him dazedly. His followers had vanished. Grundy picked himself up, gasping for breath, and streaming with water.

"Oh, my hat! Oh, crumbs!" gasped Grundy. "Rotten funks-ow-groogh!" A howl of msympathetic laughter greeted Grundy as he made for the School House to look for a towel. "Hallo! Have you demonstrated!" yelled Tom Merry.
"Bai Jove! You look wathah wet, Gwundy."
"Ha, ha, ha!" Grundy rubbed water out of his eyes and wundy."

"Ha, ha, ha!"
"Why didn't you back me up!" roared rundy. "New I've been ducked in the Grundy. "New dashed fountain-

"Ha, ha, ha!"
"You cackling idiots!" "Ha, ha, ha!

Grundy, snorting with wrath, tramped into the School House, leaving the juniors howling with laughter. Grundy's demonstration strations were over.

CHAPTER 10. Divided Chums.

THERE was a grim silence in Fig. gins' study at tea-time. Figgins and Kerr looked very Fatty Wynn looked morose.

For once there was a rift in the lute. The friendship of the chums of the New House was under a cloud.

Tea was frugal, as usual. There was no sugar. Figgins and Kerr did not care much whether they had sugar in their tea. There were worse troubles than that in war-time. But they could not help thinking of that hoard of sugar which Wynn had taken out of the school, after keeping it, without their knowledge, in their study. Even a food-hoarder might have been supposed to be willing to whack out a little among his pels-not that Figgy or Kerr would have touched anyriggy or Kerr would have touched any-thing in excess of their rights.

The two juniors felt bitterly the dis-grace that had been brought on the study.
They had always held their heads high.
Now, fellows like Clampe hinted that Fatty couldn't have hearded without his study-mates knowing it. Neither could he, if they had ever suspected him of any-thing of the kind. But they hadn't suspected.

How could anyone suspect a chum of a mean thing like that?

For it was mean—wretchedly mean! There was poor Mrs. Lomax in Ryl-combe, for instance, who could not get enough sugar to provide her children with that necessary article. She was a soldier's wife, and her husband was at the Front wile, and ner husband was as the Arona again. And while the poor woman could not get what was essential, a miserable hoarder had more than he needed! It wasn't playing the game. And Figgins' study had always prided itself, above all, study had always prided itself, above all, upon playing the game.

The two juniors felt ashamed. A mean thing like this was, in a way, worse than a crime. Surely, in war-time, every fellow ought to be willing to take his whack, and nothing more! To take-ad-set, yelling as the New House juniors vantage of the accident of having money, What was chiefly exasperating was Fatty Wynn's unrepentance. He didn't Fatty Wynn's unrepentance. He didn't look shamefaced, or even sorry. He only seemed exasperated himself, and indig-nant! That was really too thick—that Wynn himself should feel indignant at the attitude of his House-fellows on the subject. Grundy's demonstration had absurd enough, and it had ended disas-trously for Grundy; but it had stung the New House juniors. Black looks been cast at Fatty Wynn on all sides. He was already in Coventry. Black looks had

He was already in Coventry.

Nobody wanted to speak to a hoarder.

Moreover, the fellows could not help thinking that if he hoarded sugar, he hoarded other things. He might have a big supply of food hidden away somewhere, to which he paid surreptitions visits. Why not? A fellow who would grab greedily at one thing, would grab greedily at another. Clampe declared in the Common-room that if Figgg's study to the common that if Figgg's study was searched, no end of grub would come

Strange to say, Fatty Wynn hadn't any sugar with his tea, any more than-his study-mates had. It was odd, for Fatty had a very sweet tooth, and he missed sugar, perhaps, more than a hing else. So far as they remembered, Figgy and Kerr had not seen him take sugar for a long time—even when there was the regu-lar allowance handed out, Fatty Wynn had not been seen consuming his share. Apparently he kept it for private gorging.

But Kerr had been thinking about that, Kerr was given to rather deeper thinking than most of the fellows. And he sud-denly broke the silence at the glum teatable "Fatty ! His fat study-mate glared at him without replying.

"Where did you get that sugar, Fatty?

'Find out!" "Have you been saving up your allowance?

'Find out!"

Figgins started.
"Oh!" he ejaculated. "Perhaps he got it that way. Did you save up your sugar allowance, Fatty?"
"Find out!" retorted Fatty Wynn, for the third time.

the third time. Fatty's usually good-humoured and sunny face was hard and uncompromising. He did not look friendly. Of course, a chap's allowed to save up his allowance if he likes," said Figgins. No harm in that, if he chooses to go without. But what's the good of saving it up?"

Fatty Wynn grunted.

"No good saving it up, to bott all at once, that I can see," said Figgins.
"And if a chap saved up his sugar, he ought to whack it out when the stuff goes short. No good saving it up otherwise."

Grunt. "What have you done with it, Fatty?" asked Kerr.

Grunt, Can't you answer?" snapped

Figgins. Fatty Wynn pushed away his empty plate, and rose, with a bitter look on his face—a look that was very uncommon there. there.

"Don't talk to me!" he said. "I'm a food-hoarder, ain't I? I take the grub out of the mouths of the poor, like those rich rotters in the West End who went round in motor-cars gathering up grub before the Food Controller put his foot down. I ain't fit to be spoken to, am I? I'm the kind of chap that causes hunger riots through being a hog, you know!'

"Look here--"

"Look here—"
"I'm a fat worm!" went on Fatty Wynn, with increasing bitterness. "Tm a sneaking rotter piling up grub I don't want, while kids are starving in the back streets, you know! That's what I am
'Yah!"

And with that unexpected wind-up. Fatty Wynn tramped savagely out of the Figgins and Kerr looked at one another. Fatty Wynn's outbreak had taken them guite aback.

"I'm afraid there's a bloomer somehow." said Korn said Kerr.

"But the sugar!" said Figgins. had it! He's got it now, hidden away somewhere!

Kerr nodded. Yes; that beats me. Still, he might have saved his sugar allowance. We know he hasn't had any sugar in the study for weeks and weeks." Still, he might study for weeks and weeks."

"I suppose he must have saved it, as he didn't scoff it," said Figgins. "I never noticed specially. But it's as you say. But—but why should a chap save up his allowance, and keep it in a bag? He can't have intended to have a feed all by himself on lumps of sugar. That's rot! Still, if it has own allowance, saved up, he's got a right to it. But why can't he say so?"

"Because he's got his back up for being called a hoarder," said Kerr.

called a hoarder," said Kerr.
"The other fellows won't believe it. There's no object in saving up sugar in a bag. It's too steep."

bag. It's too steep."
"I believe it, though," said Kerr.
"Well, so do I, if you do," said Figgins, who generally relied on his Scottish chum's judgment. "But the other s judgment. fellows won't

"I'm afraid they won't, unless Fatty can give a reason.

And he can't do that." "It seems not.

Figgins and Kerr finished their tea in a dum mood. They went down to the Common-room, where some of the New glum moed. House fellows were discussing the iniquities of Fatty Wynn. They explained their view of the matter, which was re-their view of the matter, which was re-ceived with scoffing

"Oh, draw it mild!" said Thompson.
"Anybody found with hoarded grub could say he had saved it out of his allowance."
"Wynn hasn't said so—"
"Well, if it's true, why can't he?"
"Why should he save it up?" saked Redfern. "There's no sense in it. What reason could be have for putting his sugar in a bag instead of into his tea?"

And to that question Figgins and Kerr could find no reply. It beat them hollow, They wandered out into the quadrangle, not feeling in much of a humour for cricket, or anything else. Suddenly Fig-gins halted, his eyes blazing as they were fixed on a placard stuck on one of the old elms. There was an inscription daubed on it with a brush to the following effect:

WHERE ARE THE HOARDERS? IN THE NEW HOUSE! WHERE THE FOOD-HOGS? IN THE NEW HOUSE!"

Figgins gritted his teeth. That's some School House cad!" he "Inat's some ocnour House can: " exclaimed, tearing down the placard,
"My hat! I'll find the rotter who stuck that up there, and make him eat it!"
"Hold on!" exclaimed Kerr, as Fig-gins strode towards the School House.

Figgins strode on, his face dark with anger, and Kerr followed him. Kerr was exasperated by the taunt levelled at the whole House for the fault of one member; but he did not quite see how two fellows were to deal with all the School House at once. Figgins was too excited to think of that.

He strode into the School House, the He strode into the School House, the crumpled placard clutched in his hand, his eyes glittering. Blake & Co. were in the hall, and Figgins marched up to them, and thrust the offending placard under their astonished noses. "Who did that?" he roared.

"Bai Jove!

"I'm ready to lick him, whoever he was, or a dozen of him!" roared Figgins.
"I'm ready, unless he's a funk as well as a liar! Now, then!"

CHAPTER 11. Brought to Light.

FORGE FIGGINS' powerful voice rang far and wide. Fellows looked round from all Fellows tooked round from all quarters.

"Hallo! New House worms!" said Tom Merry, "Kick 'em out!"

"Yans, wathah!"
Figgins glared at the juniors gathering round. Figgins feared no foe, especially when his temper was up.

"I've come here to look for a lying funk!" he shouted. "Better look in your own House!" suggested Monty Lowther. "Lots of them there.' "Ha, ha, ha!"

"As well as food-hogs!" sniggered

Trimble. brandished the crumpled

Figgins placard in the air.

placard in the air.
"I want to know who did that! I'm going to lick him!"
"Weally, Figgins—"
"Was it you?" shonted Figgins.
Arthur Augustus D'Arcy extracted his cycglass from his waisteoat pocket, put his eye, and surveyed Figgins scornfully,

I wefuse to answah," he said. "I do not like bein' woared at in that mannah,

Figgins."
"You silly ass—"
"If you chawactewise me as a sillay glass, Blake, while feahful thwashin'?"

"Look here, Figgins---" began Tom

Merry, interposing. "Fighine—began for Merry, interposing." For haps it was you!" snorted Figgins. "It it was you, come out to the gym, and put up your hands!" said Tom Merry testily. "It was most likely Trimble or Racke, I should say. But New House cads can't roar at us in our own House, so you had better slide out."
"I'm not going till I've found the cad who wrote this!" said Figgins. "Some sneaking School House funk..."

! If you have food-hogs in your House, Figgins, you must expect to be weminded of it!" said D'Arcy warmly, Figgins made a jump at the swell of St. Jim's. The next moment he was struggling in a dozen pairs of hands. Kerr rushed to his help, and was collared at once.

"Frog's march!" shouted Blake.

"Yaas, wathah!"

"Hurray!

In the midst of a shouting crowd, Figgins and Kerr were frog's marched out of the House. Kildare of the Sixth was coming up the steps, and he stared was coming up the seeps, and he search at the excited procession.

"Stop that!" rapped out the captain of St. Jim's. "You disorderly young rascals; what game are you playing?" "Only frog's-marching a pair of House bounders," said Manners. all right, Kildare."
"Outs all wight deah boy."

"Quite all wight, deah boy.
"Put them down at once!"

"Weally, Kildare—"rapped out the St. Jim's captain.
"Do you hear me?" rapped out the st. Jim's captain.
"The Cem Library.—No. 492.

Figgins and Kerr, breathless and dis-hevelled, were set upon their feet. They panted, and glared defiance at the School House fellows.

House fellows.
"Now, what's all this about?" said the prefect sharply.
"Rotten funks!" gasped Figgins. "I'll lick the whole lot of 'em, one at a time—two if they like! Ow!".
"I'm your man!" said Jack Blake promptly.

aas, wathah!" "Shut up!" exclaimed Kildare. "If-you New House kids have come over

"We came to look for a sneaking funk!" howled Figgins. "He's afraid to show himself! Just like a School House cad!"

"Bump him!" "Kick him out!"

"Be quiet, I tell you!" exclaimed Kildare angrily. "Figgins, if you want me to take you in to your Housemaster-I don't care!"

"I don't care!"
"Well, if you don't care, I think I'll do it." said the captain of St. Jim's grimly. "You can't talk to a prefect like that, my son. What's that in your paw?" His eyes fell on the offending placard. "Oh! Give that to me."
Kill. Figgins savagely handed it over. dare knitted his brows.

"Is that what you came here about,

"Is that what you came here assure, Figgins?"
"Yes, it is," growled Figgins.
"This kind of thing isn't a joke," said Kildare. "This is an insult! I want to know who wrote this placard."

"Chance for you, Trimble," grinned Cardew, pushing the fat junior forward. Baggy Trimble did not seem anxious to meet Kildare's eye. He wriggled behind Tom Merry as Cardew pushed

"Who was it?" rapped out Kildare.

"Come now!" squeaked Trimble.
"Oh, it was you, was it?"
"No; I said it wasn't!"
"No need for you to speak at all, if it wasn't," said Kildare. "Come here! Did you write this placard, Trimble."
"It—it's true," said Trimble. "It's true, Kildare. They're food-hogs. There's no end of grub stacked in Figgins' study. I've seen it—"
"What?"
"Well, there was some.

"Well, there was some, anyway," amended Trimble. "Wynn's taken it away; but all the fellows know it was sneak !" "You rotten muttered

Figgins.
"Well, you shouldn't come here kicking up a row, if you don't wan it known," said Trimble defiantly. "You shouldn't be a food-hog!"

Kildare's brow darkened.

"Is there anything in this, Figgins?" he exclaimed.
"No!" growled Figgins. "If anybody

"No!" growled Figgins. "If anybody calls me a food-hog, I'll punch his head!"
"Has there been any food in excess of the allowance, stored in your study?"
demanded Kildare. "You know I'm bound to look into this, as a prefect."
"You're not a New House prefect,"

"You're not a Ne said Figgins sulkily. "Quite so," assente assented Kildare. "If you

"Quite so," assented Kildare. "If you prefer to explain to your Housemaster, it's quite within your rights. I'll see that you do. Come with me to Mr. Ratcliff, both of you." Figgins and Kerr followed Kildare across the quadrangle. There was no house the control of the control help for it.

Blake whistled softly.

Blake whistled softly.

Wynn "Well, it was bound to come out.

THE BEST 30. LIBRARY THE "BOYS' FRIEND" 30. LIBRARY. HOLEN

"Twimble is a wotten eneak, all the

"Yes, rather! Bump him!"
But Baggy Trimble had already disappeared.

After all, it's like Figgins' cheek to kick up a row," remarked Levison. "There is a food-hog in his House, after

"And he's going to get it in the neck, when Ratty is put on the track," said

Meanwhile, Kildare marched the two meanwane, andare marened the two dismayed juniors into Mr. Ratcliff's study in the New House. He briefly explained the matter, and Mr. Ratcliff turned two very sharp eyes on the iuniors.

"A very serious matter," he said.
"What have you to say, Figgins?"
"Nothing, sir."

"Nothing, sir."
"And you, Kerr?"
"Nothing, sir."
"You admit that you have acted in contravantion of the food rules?"

"No, sir."
"And what of Wynn? Has he done

Figgins and Kerr were silent. They did not intend to give evidence against atty Wynn. Fatty Wynn.

"At!" Mr. Ratcliff compressed his lips. "I think I see. Wynn is the guilty party apparently. Thank you for bring the matter to my notice, Kildare. I my the matter to my notice. shall inquire into it very strictly.

shall inquire into it very strictly."
Kildare left the study.
"Now, Figgins, kindly explain to me precisely what Wynn has done!"
Figgins closed his lips hard.
"Do you hear me, Figgins."
"Yes, sir."
"Well, answer me!"
"I've nothing to say, sir."
Mr. Ratcliff's eyes glittered.
"Where is be gone out, sir."
"Very well. When he comes in, bring him to my study—all three of you. You may go now!"

may go now!"

Figgins and Kerr went.

"The fat's in the fire now, Figgy," murmured Kerr, as the Housemaster's door closed.

door closed.

Figgins nodded. There was no doubt about that. The food-hog of the New House was booked.

CHAPTER 12. All Serene !

OM MERRY & CO. wheeled their bicycles down to the gate DM MERKY & CO. wheeled their bicycles down to the gate. Arthur Augustus D'Arcy stopped in his graceful saunter in the quad, and greeted them. "Goñi out, deah boys?" "Payin a visit," said Tom, with a smile. "We're going to see a lady." "Bai Jove!" "Bai Jove!"

"Bai Jove!"
"You'd better come along, Guesy," said Monty Lowther solemnly. "With your fascinating manners, you know..."
"Weally, Lowthah..."

"Weally, Lowthah..."
"Besides, you know the lady," said Tom, laughing. "We're going down to the village to call on Mrs. Lomax. That fat idiot Trimble says her husband has been called up ggain, and we're going to offer to help with the allotment. As been called up again, offer to help with the allotment. As you're a wonderful gardener, Gussy, you can come along, and we'll give you directions while you do the digging." "Bai Jove! I shall be vewy pleased to come, deah boys. I'm wathah a good to be t

"Bai Jove! I shall be vewy pleased to come, deah boys. I'm wathah a good hand at hoein' up potatoes, you'k know. Wait till I get my jiggah."

And the swell of St. Jim's ran his machine out, and pedalled away with the Terrible Three to Rylcombe. Figgins and Kerr were in the gateway, looking very glum, waiting for Fatty Wynn to come in.

The Gen Leasury - No 400.

THE GEM LIBRARY.-No. 492.

"If you ace Wynn, tell him he's good licking for it, Mrs. Lomax, so—" wanted!" called out Kerr.

"Will you dry up?"
"The School House juniors rode away
The School House juniors rode away
the school yesterday, after it had been nosed the cheerfully.
They reached the little the country, said Tom. "That's what's the matter."
The property of the school was a said to the s "Right-ho!"
The School House juniors rode away cheerfully. They reached the locating close by the village, and jumped off their machines, leaning them against the fence. They assumed their brightest smiles as Tom Merry knocked at the cottage door.

It was opened by Mrs. Lomax.

It was opened by Mrs. Lomax. The patient-looking woman smiled as she saw the four cheery boyish faces. "Good-evenin, madam?" said Arthur Augustus, raising his cap gracefully. "May we have the pleasuah of helpin with the potatoes," and Mrs. Long.

with the potatoes?"

"Please come in!" said Mrs. Lomax smiling. "You are very kind. You have come to help Master Wynn?"

"Wynn!" exclaimed all the juniors together.

"Did you not know he was here?"
"Bai Jove! No:"

"Bai Jove! No."

The jumiors passed through into the big garden behind the cottage. A fat your has bending over the potatotickling down his face, which was crickling down his face, which was con a clothes-line near at hand.

"You here, Fatty?" exclaimed Tom Merry.

Merry.

Merry.
Fatty Wynn spun round.
"Hallo! What do you School House bounders want?" he demanded gruffly.
"We've come to work. We heard from we ve come to work. We heard from frimble that Lomax was gone," ex-plained Tom Merry. "I knew that weeks ago!" grunted Fatty Wynn.

Fatty Wynn.
"Well, we didn't! You'd better hand me that hoe. You're wanted at the school."

"Blow the school!"

"You'd better go," said Tom seriously. "Figgy's waiting for you. The fact is, there's going to be some trouble, Wynn. It's come out about the sugar."

Fatty Wynn snorted.
"May as well know what to expect," said Monty Lowther. "You've got to said Monty Lowther. "You've got to see Ratty, and he's got on to the sugar being stored in your study. Sorry, but you really shouldn't have done it, you Snort!

"Is Master Wynn in trouble at the school?" asked Mrs. Lomax anxiously.

"I am so sorry!"
"It's nothing, ma'am," said Fatty Wynn, "Only a silly mistake of some silly fools!"

silly fools!"
But the good lady looked anxious.
"You spoke of the sugar, Master Lowther. I hope there is no trouble about Master Wynn bringing it to me."
"About what?" yelled Monty Lowther.
"Gweat Scott."
"Master Wynn saved up his sugar allowance, and brought it for my children," said Mrs. Lomax. "It was very kind and generous of him. and I am very kind and generous of him, and I am sure he did not know there could be any objection—""

Fatty Wyn's face was scarlet.
"It's all right, ma'am!" he gasped.
"It isn't that! Don't— Here, leggo, Tom Merry, you ass!"

But Tom grasped him by his plump shoulders and shook him. A light dawned upon his mind.

"Was that it, you fat duffer?" he shouted. "Was it your own allowance that you were saving up for Mrs. Lomax?"

"Find out!"
"I'm' jolly well going to! said Tom.
"I'm' jolly well going to! said Tom.
Mrs. Lomax, Wynn has been accused thourding sugar. It's supposed that shourding sugar. It's supposed that so be sugar that so be supposed that so be sugar that so be supposed that so be sugar that so be supposed that so be supposed that so be supposed that supposed "Find out!"
"I'm' jolly well going to! said Tom.
"Mrs. Lomax, Wynn has been accused of hoarding sugar. It's supposed that he's bought it secretly, against the rules

"But he brought it to me, for the children!" exclaimed Mrs. Lomax. "It is the second time time he has done so. Is out the time time at the same second electric wouldn't have let him, only the children—they need it so much, and I could not get it, and—and the dear boy was so pressing, that I could not refuse

"You fat fraud!" shouted Manners.
"Why couldn't you tell us?"
"Go and est coke!" said Fatty Wynn.
"Well, we shall jolly well tell all the fellows now!" said Tom Morry.
"I'll punch your silly head if you do!"
growled Fatty Wynn. "It's not their tueinees or yours, either."
"Rats! We'll get back with Wynn now, Mrs. Lomax, and come to-morrow to work, if you don't mind. We've got to get Fatty out of a serane. The silly ass has let himself get suspected of loarding, while he was hiding his gidd light under a bushel."
And the four junions crammed Fatty

And the four juniors crammed Fatty And the four juniors crammed Fatty Winn's jacket on him, and rushed out. They walked their machines home, Fatty Wynn breathing wrath and threats all the way, apparently more alarmed at the prospect of his good deeds becoming known than that of a licking from his known than that of a neking from his Housemaster.

But Tom Merry & Co. did not heed.

Figgins and Kerr were still at the gates when they arrived at St. Jim's.

"Here he is!" exclaimed Tom Merry.

"Found out!" head doing now?" growled

"What's he been doing now?" growled

Figgins.

"Saving up his sugar allowance and taking it away for a soldier's kids." "What-a-a-at?"

"What-a-a-at?"
"And we've bowled him out!"
chuckled Aruthur Augustus. "And we've jolly well goin' to tell evewybody—"
"You're not!" roared Fatty Wynn.
"Fatty." exclaimed Kerr and Figgius together breathlesely. "You fat fraud!
Why didn't you tell us?
"So I would have tell you when it

wny dnan't you tell us?

"So I would have told you, when it came out that the sugar was there, if you hadn't called me a hoarder!" growled Fatty Wynn. "Why skouldn't fa fellow save his sugar allowance if he likes? I suppose those kids want it more than I do, don't they? Yah!"

"Sorry, Fatty—"

"We ought to have guessed it was

"We ought to have guessed it was something like that," said Kerr. "Sorry, Fatty!"

"Br-r-r-r!"

"Br-r-r-r!" his chums linked arms with "Br-r-r-r!" his chums linked arms with m to march him to Mr. Ratcliff's study, and the Terrible Three and D'Arey went and the Terrible Three and D Arcy went with them to explain.

Mr. Ratcliff greefed them with a sour face. But when he heard what the juniors had to tell him, even Mr. Ratcliff's sour face melted into a sort of crusty smile. He condescended to give crusty smile. He condescended to give wynn an approving look.

"I am glad to see, Wynn, that you are capable of self-sacrifice," he said.
"Very commendable—very commendable indeed! You may go."

And Fatty Wynn went.
Outside. Figgins and Kerr and the Terrible Three seized him, and shouldered the interest the guad. Fatty expositulating him into the quad, Fatty expostulating frantically from his perch on their shoulders. But he could not help him-

"Lemme get at him!" roared Fatty | Wynn furiously. "Ha, ha, ha!"

"Lemme get at the rotter! I'll pulverise him-verise him—"

"Hurrah for the Good Boy of St.
Jim's!" sniggered Racke of the Shell.
Three or four fellows collared Racke and bumped him on the ground, and Racke's snigger was heard no more.
Then Fatty, in spite of his breathless fursa shouldered round the quad. The was necessary to set him right by the state of the fellows who had majured him, and Fatty Wynn escaped at last, and fold the war would last, and whether they to his study. And when Redfern & Co. came along to say they were sorry, he hurled a custion at them which bowled Reddy over like a skittle, and followed it up with a stream of ink—and after that he was left in peace.

Concord reigned once more in Figgins study in the New House, and Figgins and Kerr were proud of their chum. Fatty Wynn forgot that he had been offended, and all was calm and bright. And when at tea-time next day he asked Figgins and Kerr how long they thought!

THE END.

(Don't miss next Wednesday's Great Story of Tom Merry & Co. at St. Jim's And when at tea-time next day he asked Figgins and Kerr how long they thought!

that was the most effective way.

"KILDARE OF THE GREAT HEART!" By Martin Clifford.

Ey Martin Clifford.

The Shell and Fourth are the Forms at St. Jim's upon which there is mainly centres, and the strength of the strength of the fars of the Third or the great men of the Sixth are chronicled have always found plenty of admirers. I have no doubt whatever that my readers will be considered the capital of St. Jim's shows himself the great-hearted, plucky fellow that he is, and Knox once more reveals himself as a rotter. Monteith comes into the story, too. The port and the type of the story to the story to the port of the story to the port of the story to the port of the property of the story to the port of the story to the stor

A LETTER FROM CANADA. And a very nice letter, too—the kind of letter it does one good to receive! "B." writes thus from Montreal:

Dear Sir,—I am not going to apologise for taking up your time with my epistic, for I am one of your oldest readers, and I think I have a right to a few minutes. I have read the Gen from the start. More than that, I knew some of the leading characters the control of the contro

No. Jim's, and my old favourities lost some of the limelight in consequence.

"Yours is a very good work, and Mr. Clifford knows how to depict fine types of boys—and men. too. Any father weed the sound of a son whe. The harest who laracter was a son whe the sound of a son whe was the property of the son which their children to read the Gam must be very narrow-minded, or very badly prejudiced. The majority of those I have met who have not camination, those I have met who have on examination, those I have met who have not considered the son which were stopped, for not even the keenest were allowed to the son which were the son which were the son the son which were the son th

"I have two brothers with the Canadians. They get my papers sent on weekly, and enjoy every word of them. Carry on with stories of Jack Blake and Figgins and their the good work, dear Editor! I. for one, the control of the control yarns—Your devoted reader,

On behalf of Messrs, Martin Clifford and Frank Richards, as well as on my own
Frank Richards, as well as on my own thank my correspondent. A reader from the first, and as keen as ever after more than ten years! What bigger compliment could an author ask?
I, too, remember "Pluck" in the old days, when the first story in it was slways a school school the mext, the way of my readers school the mext, the thing of my readers than the my complete the my complete the my complete the law a double link with those who do, for a good many of those school stories—not the St. Jim's ones—were my work.

your Editor

FRIENDLY EPISTLES OF CUTTS AND BANKS. My Comic Column. By MONTY LOWTHER.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—The authenticity of these letters is, to say the least, doubtful. The supposed handwriting of the two parties bears to the parties bear the page. But that is Monty's funeral, not mine!—T.M.]

"Dear Mr. Banks.—You say Deadheat is absolutely sure to romp home with the Codham Cup? Then, for goodness take, put me a couple of Tunebosed with this letter. If the complex is the complex of the complex is the complex of the compl " Greyfriars.

"Dere Mr. Cutts.—Yuv "Green Mann. mistake in yer reckoning. Itz sevin quid yer owe me. Cores. He admit it may look like a five on the I O U, but believe me itz sivin. If there's enny dowt in the matter, or if yud like to raze enny objekshuns, I can place the slip befor yere headmaster, and see what he maits or you have been and see I V before im, weather or no, if the munny leen pade in three days.

J. Banks." " Green Mann

tell you, dealing with a villain like you. Meet me in wood at 5 p.m. to-morrow, and I will pay you in full. Gerald Cutts."

"Friardale Infirmary. Master Cutts,—Drat yer! Yer very neer didd for me in the wood with that grate stick. Tm. in the orspital now, with me head almost burstin. But yer'll be sorry for it afor long! The perlic are on there way to the skewl, so take yer larst longing look at it.

at it. "H.M. Prison, —"
"Banks, you rotter!—Confound on —"
Those measly bobbles arrested me, and the been in prison, though, I'm to be half of the mean to the mea

By MONTY LOWTHER.

A Dutch paper says that trainloads of German dead have been taken to the blast furnaces to be cremated. It is just like the Huns to make light of grave subjects in this

THE WAIL OF THE REJECTED. A poor chap in Category Z 5 sends us the following pathetic plaint:

- I shall never march with banners Gaily streaming in the breeze; I shall never help in bringing Kaiser Bill down on his knees; I shall never have a look-in, When they're handing out V.C.'s.

But a chap home from the Front says that the rejected johnny ought to have put it more like this;

- I shall never share a billet
 With a thousand thousand fleas;
 I shall never stand with water
 Swishing ley round my knees;
 I shall never feel the marrow
 In my backbone slowly freeze.

German soldiers are said to regard being sent to the Somme front as equivalent to a death sentence. But, really, it is quite certain that they will "go West."

Haggy Trimble and other prize porkers have been bemoaning the shortage of sugar and sweetsetul. Sugar and the shortage of sugar and seventees the sugar and the sugar sugar

EXTRACTS FROM

"Tom Merry's Weekly"&"The Greyfriars Herald."

THE CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR. By Ernest Levison.

RIMBLE of the Fourth had been talk-

IRIMBLE of the Fourth had been canding too much.

He generally does.
So long as Trimble talked about the glories of Trimble Hall—which none of the fellows had ever such as the wonderful things he would not cricket—if he kiked; or he way he would have mopped up Hums-if he were only old coungn—it didn't matter.

enough—it didn't matter.

A follow has a right to gas as much as he likes in a free country. But Trimble had been talking too much about old Railton; and that put the lid on.

It isn't Mr. Railton's fault that he has a ousin who figured as a "conscientious objector." Besides, the man has changed his mind, and joined up since. Most of the fellows agreed that it was an unpleasant subject, and that the least said the soonest

But that wasn't good enough for Trimble. It was a tit-bit for him, and he wouldn't let the subject rest, especially after Railton had caned him for exceeding the grub allowance about a dozen times.

Trimble talked about what conscientious objector, and also may it reflected on objector, and also may it reflected on the second property of the second prop ance about a dozen times.

said together: Mercy

They thought it was one of Lowther's jokes

"Fathead!" said Lowther. "I've beca thinking about Trimble! I'm fed-up with his gas!"

his gas!"
"Same here!" said Manners.
"Hear, hear!" said Tom Merry.
"To hear him talk, a fellow would think be was yearning to have a go at the Huns; continued Lowther. "Now, if they lowered the age to fitteen, instead of raising it forty-live, what do you think Trimble would

"Hide in the coal-cellar!" grinned Tom

"Hide in the coal-cellar!" grinned Tom Merry.

"Or up the chimney!" chuckled Manners.
"Exactly. Now, I don't much like conscientions objected their not with the conscientions objected their point of view, and I don't specially want to. But even if a conscientions objector is as bad as a warpfoitteer, his relations can't help it, and Trimble's got. The second of the conscientions objector is as bad as a warpfoitteer, his relations can't help it, and Trimble's got of the consciention of the consciention

there!"
"Ha, ha, ha!"
"But they're not going to, surely?"
"Well, I can't say I know anything about it," admitted Lowther. "I don't—alens! think it likely myself. They don't seem to realise what they're missing in leaving there, and I dare say it won't down on them till too late. But that's the wheeze!"
"Eh! What is?"

Lowther.

owther.
"Yes, rather!"
"And not a word outside this study!"
"Not a merry syllable!"
And the Terrible Three chortled in chorus.
The next afternoon there was cricket, an afternoon there was cricket, and Monty Lowther was out of gates.

Monty Lowther was out of gates.

After the cricket a good many fellows assembled at Dame Taggles' tuckshop, in the corner of the quad, to discuss the game, and ginger-beer, and the one of two the transparent of the controller transparent of the controller transparent of the controller transparent of the controller of Baggy wasn't popular. Then, chiefly to make himself obnoxious, he began talking about Railton's cousin, as usual.

about Railton's cousin, as usual.

"If I had any conscientious objectors in the family, I'd squash 'em," Baggy was saying when Monty Lowther looked in at the doorway. "My opinion is that Railton ought to resign from the school. It's too bad! All my relations of military age are in—."

"America" asked Manners.

"No, you ass:
"Switzerland" Baggy Trimble, as the fellows chuckled. "In khaki, of course! If I were only old enough—."

fellows chuckled. "In khaki, of course! If I were only old enough."
Then Monty Lowther burst in "Glorious news!" he roared.
"Glorious news!" he roared.
"Glorious news!" he roared.
"Glorious news!" he roared.
"Kaiser hanged hisses!"
"Great Sent Hanged hisses!"
"Object Hanged hisses!"
"Object Hanged hisses!"
"Great Scott!"
"Bai Jove!"
"Bai Jove!"
"Bai Jove!"
"Bai Jove!"
"Monty Lowther didn't-answer the question.

Monty Lowther didn't-answer the question. He pirouetted round the tuckshop in a state

He pirouetted round the tucksnop in a state of exuberant delight. "Fifteen!" he chortled. "Think of it! Now, then, roll up! Who's coming this afternoon to the recruiting-office at Way-

"Bai Jove! I'm comina!"
"Same here!"
"Hurrah!"

"Hurrah!"

"Sure, I'll wait till I see it in the papers intirely," said Reilly of the Fourth, with a suspicious look at Monty-Lowther.
Lowther did not heed.

"Come on, Tom!" Come on, Manners!
Let's be the first!" he shouted.

"Come on."

"Tom Marrah!"

"Tom Marrah!"

"Hurrah!"
Tom Merry caught Trimble by the arm.
Trimble was standing quite still, looking as if he had been suddenly rooted to the floor.
"Come on, To Baggy.
"You're coming with us, of course?" said Manners, taking his other arm. "We four will set the example:
"Loggo!" shricked Lowther.
"Loggo!" shricked Trimble. "I'm not coming!"

"Do you want to wait till you're combed out?" demanded Monty Lowther. "Or are you going to set up as a conscientious objector?"

objector?"
"Ha, ha, ha!"
Most of the fellows had tumbled to it by that time; but Trimble didn't tumble. — He was in such a blue funk that he hardly knew whither he was on his head or his

His fat jaw had dropped, and his round eyes were nearly bulging out of his fat face. Monty Lowther seemed overjoyed with the Monty Lowther proceeded to explain, and news he had brought, but Trimble didn't seem to merry and Manners stared at first, and then chortled.

Mind you back me up!" concluded was that the military age should be lowered

He wriggled like a fat rabbit as the Ter-rible Three marched him towards the door. He caught hold of the doorpost, and clung

He caught hold or two there, yelling there, yelling the control of the control of it compulsory?" I_I_I_is Trimble. "Oh, no!" said Lowther. "Nothing com-pulsory about it!"

"Then I won't go!"

"Are na won't go!"
"Mwy not?" demanded Tom Merry sternly.
"Are you afraid of the Germans?"
"Nunno! I.--I'm as brave as a lion!"
gasped Trimble. "But-but k-I don't want to kill anybody and the liout want
to kill anybody and the liout want to kill anybody and liout any liout any liout to kill any liout any liout any liout group!"
"Perlow ""

Groogh!"
"Perhaps you won't kill anybody," said Lowther consolingly. "You may simply figure in the casualty-list!"
"Yarooh!" roared Trimble.
He seemed to think that that would be

"Look here, Trimble, you're coming! The "Look here, Trimble, you're conding: I me fellows look to you to set them an example!"

"Yarooh! Lemme go!"
Trimble was jerked away from the doorpost, and the Shell fellows rushed him out post, and the such tentows reside and to into the quadrangle.

They had him down to the gates in a twinkling, and a crowd rushed after them to see them. off.

twinkling, and a crowd rushed after them to see them off.

Bagy Trimble was yelling for help as they started for Wayland. Everybody else was yelling with laughter.

Down the lane they went, Bagy wrigding and struggling. But Tom Merry and Manners had an arm cach, and Monty Lowther waked behind, helping Trimble on with the too of his book. Baggy had to go.

Baggy had to go.

"I—I say, leggo!" he pleaded, as they turned into the footpath to Wayland. 'I—I don't want to enlist, you know:"
"But we're going to if you do, said from country needs every man who can craw!"
"The country be blowed!" gasped Trimble. "My hat! I must say that sounds patriotic!" said Lowther. "Bon't you understand that slackers will be combed out,

"I—I'll get my pater to send me to Switzer-land:" walled Trimble. "Yow! I wish I'd gone there last vac, and—and stayed there! Oh, dear! I won't come!" "Buck up!" said Lowther; and he let out

"Brick up!" said Lowther; and he let out his hoot again.

And Trimble yelped and toddled on.

Trimble isn't fi good walker, but Tom Merry & Co. are, so they did the walk through the bush of the said of the last stile, and yelped He'eling to the last stile, and yelped He'eling to the last stile, and yelped on the said of the said

A conscientious objector-what!"

"Hallo! A conscientions objector—what!"
yelled Lowther.
"Yes," said Trimble desperately. "I—I can see now how—how right they have been all along. I—I never understood before.
Now I come to think of it, I—I have a very strong conscientious objection to all warfare!" fare "Besides, we "Too late!" said Manners. "Be know you haven't any conscience.

never shown any signs of having one perfore!"

before!" I have!" shricked Trimble, hanging on to the stile. "I'm against the war! Yarooh! I'm not zoing to be killed! Yaroo! I—I don't like trenches! Leggo! —I'm going to join the stop-the-war party!

Why, you went to hiss the peace meeting Wayland only last week!" said Tom

"1-I was an ass!" groaned Trimble.
"What I really meant was that I believe in peace by negotiations, and all that. I-I think the war ought to end, you know, and let the chaps come home—I do really!

Trimble was unbooked off the stile, and the Terrible Three walked him on to Way-

The fat junior had hardly enough breath left in him to yelp when they came into Wayland High Street.

Wayland High Street.

He limped and dragged among the Tertible Three, gasping.

"Now pull yourself together!" said Tom Merry encouragingly. "The recruiting-office a man, you know, when you zo in!"

"I'm not going in!" moaned Trimble.

"You are; and we're going to see you enlist before we—ahem!—enlist ourselves!"
said Manners. "Be a man, you know.
Remember all come things you're said wanter to talk about you like that?"

"I—I don't care! I—I want to go home!"

"i—I don't care! I—I want to go home!"

Trimble.

Think of the honour of St. Jim's!" urged Lowther.
"Blow St. Jim's:

"Blow St. Jim's."
"Think of the old flag, and the glory of war, and the deep, stern music of the cannon's throat." said Lowther eloquently. "Think of making the Hun run." Think of charging the "machine-guns......" Yow-ow!

"Facing a hall of bullets-"
"Grough!"

getting perforated all over-" Wow

"Think of the bursting shells, and things like that! It will buck you up!" said Lowther encouragingly, as they came up to the recruiting-office doorway. "Think of your legs going off— Hallo! Hold him!"

As if by accident, the Terrible Three let go of Baggy Trimble just as they reached the doorway of the recruiting-office. A soldier who was standing there stared at them-not guessing, very likely, that they were recruits.

recruits But the sight of khaki just then gave Baggy But the sight of khaki just their gave bags) Trimble an awful shock. He tore himself away, and found he was loose, and ran for it. "Come back!" shouted Lowther. But Baggy Trimble didn't even look back. He went down the street like a motor-bike, the Terrible Three trotting on his track at a more easy rate.

more easy rate.

Baggy looked back from the lane when he reached it, and saw them in the distance, running in pursuit. He raced on again, with perspiration streaming down his face, and vanished into the wood.

It was a good run home to St. Jim's from the wood of the way a good run home.

It was a good run home to 8t. Jim's from Wayland, and Bazgy wasn't an athlete. But he must have kept on the run all the ag-tion of the run all the ag-up at the school gates again. A crowd of fellows spotted him as he came staggering in, perspiring and covered with dust. "But Jove! Heah's Twimble? yelled D'Arcy. "Have you calisted, Twimble?" yelled D'Arcy. "Have you calisted, Twimble?"

yelled the conquering hero comes!" "Have they given you the two-and-nine, Trimble?"

Why ain't you in khaki?"

"Why ain't you in RIBBS." His, his you want to make the his was a many and the pumping the his should have a many and the pumping the his strength enough left to stagger into the Common-room, and there he collarsed on a sofa. Came in, half an hour better, they found him still there, breathing left, they found him still there, breathing up when they came in, and howled Yah! Keep 'em off! Yah! I won't go!

"Yah! Keep 'em off! Yah! I won't go! Ill yell for a prefect—"
"Ha, ha, ha!" "I said Monty Lowther, "Hallo, old "I said Monty Lowther, "Fallo, old it home! You ought to enter for the mile. Baggy. You'd win hands down, if you thought there was a recruiting-officer after you! By the way, why did you bolt from Wayland?"

"Yow-ow-ow! You rotter! I'm not going to enlist; I object! I've a strong conscientious objection—" scientious objection—"

"But you can't enlist," said Lowther, in surprise. "You're not eighteen!" Baggy Trimble blinked at him, as the fellows yelled. He began to understand at last.

"You said the military age was lowered to fifteen." he shricked.
"My dear ass, I didn't! I said, 'What do not think of the military act being lowered to fifteen?" said Lowther calmly. "That's fifteen! Biteen? said Lowther calmly. That's quite a different thing—simply asking a question in a general sort of way."

"Ha, ha, ha."

"Then—then it isn't?" gasped Trimble.

THE ICE-CREAM MERCHANTS.

By GEORGE HERRIES.

parcels.

"What is it, deah boy?" Arthur Augustus beamed genially upon his minor. But the beam faded, the famous monoie was jammed into place, and Walls was subjected to severe inspection. "Well, fathead, what's the matter? Am I looking extra fascinating—what?" "Extwa gwibby and vevy unitidat?" "Oh, rats! Look here, Whatton of Grey-obs, which him a yarn for the Extwa gwildby and vewy initiday!"

"Oh, rats! Look here, Wharton of Grey-friars wants me to write him a yarn for the 'Greyfriars Herald.' Silly ass! Why can't he get his, own chaps to fill up his blessed friats wants me to write him a yarn for the Greyfriats Herald. '8119 ass! Why can't be get his, own chaps to, fill up, his blessed Herald '81 death boy, von should consident it an honah to be invited to write for the 'Hewald', though I admit I cannot see why Wharton should ask a fag."

"Come off it, Gus! You ain't the only chap elever chough to write. I didn't quite the great of the control of Tom Merry and his chums, Lowther and Manners, were just coming up the stairs. They halted, and Wally made his request. "Can we manage it, Montty? I spepose there is some merry celebration among the fast," said Tom Merry celebration among the fast, said among them raked up the amount. "Thanks awfully, you chaps:"

Wally datted off to his chum, Frank Levison.

Levison.

"Look here, Frank, old man, I've just got a jolly good idea, and I want you to help me

"What's the notion?"

"Well, you know what a lot of ice-cream the chaps wolf at the tuckshop? My idea is to buy a machine, and make a whack of the stuff ourselves and sell it. Then I mean to write all about it, and send it to Whatton at Gryffiars. He said an article from a St. Jim's fag might be useful to Gryffiars. Growytriars. But I don't mind, and we can teach them a thing or two-what? We can give the profits to the Red Cross, you know."

"But don't ice-cream machines cost a lot? "But done to get one?"

"I've got five bob. I saw one outside a shop in the village, and it was only seven-and-six. We ought to be able to raise that and enough for some sum to make the re-cream. How much have you got?"

"Only one-and-six. I'll ask Ernie to lend me half-a-crown. That will be enough for a start, won't it?"
"All serene! Hop off and get the tin, and

"All serene: Rop ou and get the tin, and we'll scool down to the village directly after tea and buy the machine." Tea over, they made for the village, and, after inspecting the freezer as it lay among an assortment of pans outside the shop, they entered

"An ice-cream machine, young gentlemen?
"An ice-cream machine, young gentlemen?
Why, yes, I have; and, of course, I will show you how it works. This one is quite simple, you how it and very cheap."

The contraption was bought, as were the necessary ingredients.

"Certainly not!"

"Oh!"
"Ha, ha, la!"
Baggy Trimble looked at Lowther as if he would like to eat him. The fellows were all laughing like hyenas. Baggy realised that he had had that awful run home all for nothing, and his feelings were too deep for words.

for words.

Trimble wasn't very sensitive to ridicule as a rule, but this was too much for even him. He limped out of the Common-room without another word, leaving the fellows howling. And it was a long time before the St. Jim's fellows left off addressing Trimble as "The Conscientious Objector.

THE END.

The two fags paid careful attention to the instructions for the use of their new possession. Then, chucking gleefully, they sped back to St. Jim's, hugging their precious parceis.

"Hallo, young D'Arcy! What's the game?" shouted Manners minor as they came in.

"You kids keep off! Frayne and Jameson, you may come and help, if you like; and the rest of you can buy the ice-cream when it's made?"

made.

Wally assumed an air of superiority that rather riled the rest of the Third-Formers. But they wanted to see the ice-cream made, so they stood round while Wally and Frank spread out the contents of the parcels. "There's the freezing-machine, Those are Ugh! Keep your old powders!" grunted

"Fathead! Vanilla and raspherry lectream powders are all right, you bet! That's salt in the brown paper, and that's ice in the pail, and there's a tin of Nestle's, and that's all." Wally and Femiliary 1. Wally and Frank surveyed the collection proudly, and when Jameson volunteered to make the custard Wally graciously con-sented.

sented.
"The man said the best ices are made of cream and eggs, but these are cheaper to make, and eggs are messy if you get 'en en your clobber," remarked Waily.
"I'll make the milk thick, and it will o'c as well as cream," said Frank Levison, as he hadded the milk out of the tin and care-he ladled the milk out of the tin and carefully added water.

He put the little saucepan on the fire, while Jameson proceeded to mix the powde's according to the directions read out very loudly and planly by Joe Frayne.

Wally was busy packing ice and sait as directed by the man who had sold them the machine.

directed by the man who had sold them themachine.

On a sudden there was a splutter as the milk holded over. Frank had been so intent the had been so intent the had forgotten his own department. Jameson made a wild grab at the handle of the saucepan, dropped it with a yell, and began to hop round and carees his burnt fingers.

"You howling young ass." Now you've done it? shriked Wally, while Frank researed the opened the window to get rid of the overpowering fumes of burnt milk.

In the rish to fire and to window no can dan noticed Gander. Gander was improving the shining hour by scooping out milk from the fire with his fingers, and sucking the said
Frayne and a shove which sent Gander
Frayne and a shove which sent Gander frying in one direction and the almost empty tin in another put an end to his bliss.

"You greedy young piet. You'll jolly well have to pay for that tin of milk!" yelled wally. Jam's't. It was nearly empty, any.

Wally.

"No, I sha'n't! It was nearly empty, anyway. And you can't make your beastly ice-cream, for the ice has melted and the powders are burned. Yah!" And Gander stalked off, followed by all but Wally and ble aider. his aides.

his aides. They surveyed the wreck with dismal faces. But fags don't stay long in the dumps. Frank laughed.

"I say, Wally, old seout, I think you had better write to Wharton and tell him all about this. It will read all right."

"Blow the reading! We have wasted curtin, and not got a cent for the Red Cross Fund.

"But we will, Wally!" chirped Jameson.
"We still have the machine, and can have another shot at being icie cremie merchants."

THE ROOF. ON

By PETER TODD.

E four were sitting in our study at my old school.

There were the Duffer—whose correct name is Barnes—Thompson.

Gilbert, and myself. Gilbert, and myself.

It had been pouring the night before, and the turf was like a quagmire. Cricket was distinctly off, though the pitch might have been all right for water-polo.

The Duffer was reading, Thompson was yawning, and Gilbert was asleep, with his yawning, and Gilbert was askeep, with its coromous mouth wide open, and taking petshots at the breessen mouth, but couldn't shots at the breessen mouth, but couldn't shots at the breessen between the breessen the

"Right first shot!" said the Duffer; and he added, with a brilliant inspiration; "Let's sandbag his chimney!" - yelled approval of this smart suggestion.

One or two of our chaps had just recovered from "flu, and the matron had ordered that fires should be made up in their studies. Blount was one of these invurious bounders."

"Why not stick your face in our be back the amoka made it can't spoil your face; nothing could!"

could:"
We all wanted to bag the chimney, but the Duffer was very decided on that point.
"Look here, you chaps, the idea was mine, and I'm going to bring it off. Anyone who objects will get it in the neck!"

As the Duffer weighed two stone more than any of us, and had got arms like the village blacksmith—iron—bands, you know, and all that—we let him have his way, though we folt sure he would make a mess of it.

We got an old sack, and crept along to the end of the corridor, whence a trap led through end of the corridor, whence a trap led through When we wee all up safely, the rest of us well as the safely the rest of us well as the safely safely safely

We were about eighty feet from the ground, and I was just speculating as to whether the best climber in the school could negotiate a warm down the drain-pipe, when Thompson swarm down the drain-pipe, when Thompson remarked, grinning:

"Someone's getting peevish!"
Somebody certainly seemed upset. Sounds of coughing came up to us, and we heard a window just beneath being thrown up. From somewhere below us at thick black trail of smoke streamed out a thick were almost choking with laughter, whose suddenly a sound at our feet selected us. Someone was coming at the contract of the contr at our feet sobered us. Someone was coming up the ladder to the trapdoor! We scuttled behind a chimney-stack. The trap opened, and a begrimed figure burst trap opened, and a beginned through.

Then we did gasp with horror, for "someone" was—not the pale, bespectacled Blount, one "was—not the pale, bespectacled Blount, but Palmer!

Palmer, the captain of the school! Palmer, the "chap whose thrashings put people off sitting down for a week afterwards! The Dafter must have lost his bearings somehow, sitting down for a week afterwards! The Duffer mish have lost his bearings somehow, and got to the wrong chimney. The Duffer simply field for his life. Falmer, almost beside himself with rage, gave chaec; the stage of the simply field for his life. Falmer, and the silver of the significant of the silver of the significant of the signi few steps away. Then, before we could guess what the beggar was up to, he swung round, rushed past us, and jumped out towards the distort index.

distant window.

Before we could get our breath back he had landed on the sill, and grasped the top of the window!

It was something like a miracle that he should have achieved that perilous jump safely, for the ledge on which he had landed could not have been more than six inches broad.

Just as the Duffer landed Palmer came to himself, and made a desperate clutch at the Vy above himself, and made a desperate clutch at the vigato which was in his grasp, and he rolled right over the edge. But even as he rolled him for a moment to the buttress.

None of use and him got a moment to the buttress.

None of use and him got Palmer through the window remains a puzzle; but the village blacksmith muscles helped, of course. It was done, anyway, and no sooner was it done than, overcome by his terrible ordeal.

the Duffer fainted clean away.

Nobody else ever knew the whole story of what happened. But from that day we three never changed others from doing so in the most practical way we knew of—which, of course, involved taking off jackets! Palmer behaved like a briek. He kept the secret and withheld the ashplant.

••••••••••••

NOTICES.

Correspondence Wanted.

Miss Mabelle I. Carlisle, Pretoria North, outh Africa-with girl readers-exchange South pieture postcards.

George Burchill, 28. Leeuwport Street, Boksburg, Transvaal, South Africa—with boy readers interested in stamp collecting.

I. Brinton, National Mutual, Collins Street, Melbourne, Australia—wants to form Stamp Exchange Club—stamped and addressed Exchange Club envelope, please.

Miss D. Taylor, 129. Alderney Street, South Belgravia, London, W.—with girl readers, G. F. Stockbridge, care of Messrs. Street & Creaser, 79, Hamlet Court Road, West-cliff—with boy reader in U.S.A.

Leo. Smith, 3, Trafalgar Street, Radford, Nottingham—Combined Companions League wants more members. Stamped and addressed envelope, please.

Cricket-Matches Wanted by :

Grosvenor—average age, 17-18; weak; eight-mile radius of Westmiuster.—H. B. Finali, 111, Tachbrook Street, Westminster, S.W.1.

Liscard Juniors—15; four-mile radius,—J. Egginton, 12, Liscard Crescent, Liscard.
Springfield—164; three-mile radius,—S. G. Henley, 50, Lealand Road, Stamford Hill, N. Stone's Junior-151; in d Marshall, 31, Stanley Street, S.E.S. district .- W.

Answers to Correspondents.

From "Tom Merry's Weekly."

G. A. G .- I agree with you that keeping G. A. G.—I agree with you that keeping the best player in the Lower School out of the junior cricket team through sheer jealousy would be scandalous; and it seems no end good of you to feel so concerned about it, as it cannot possibly affect you personally. "Anti-Humbing."

personally.

"Anti-Humbug."—You demand to know the name of the author of the "beastly dog-gerel." which has appeared in ordered personal p -Von demand to know the sufficiently used? Macaulty's "Lays of Ancient Rome" were not preserved eggs!

"Don Key,"—Tom Merry is between 15 and 16; Wynn is eighteen stone, or less; Crooke is a rank outsider; Skimpols is an unapreciated genius, Blake is 15; Wally D Arcy will never see six again; Racke 8—better, not Mellish is usually off-side; D'Arcy major is off his rocker, but means well; Talbot is all right; Baggy Trimble is all wrong; Gore is 15 and some months; Levison is a Jolly good forward; Cliffton Dane is a Cambrian, Noble an Australian, City & Double Africa, is fed up; and the chap who asks all these questions is a—well, see above!

questions is a-well, see above!

B. T.—This query will be answered free of charge; if you send any more, you will be good enugly to enclose a half-crown postal-order with each. Lord Devonport meant what he said-29th. Of meat per week. You are the first person who has suggested that he must really have intended 2g stone!

G. F.—Try again! Your latest effort has some merit. The part I like best is the second half of the third page. As the story finished half-way down that page, I am making use of it for these replies. Must be conomical in war-time, you know. End up war-time, you know. higher next time.

G. G. (Shell)—You begin your letter with an absurd misstatement of fact, which has completely choked me of reading further. The first two words in it are, "I think," when did you begin to do that, and what do when did you begin to do that, and what do you may be a support of 50,000 word essay on "Dynamic Intelligences" gratefully acknowledged. If it is not already illuminate and the support of the support of

To Mr. Newsagent.

Please keep for me a copy of the GEM LIBRARY each week until further notice.

(Signed),